Women in political decision-making and gender mainstreaming: obvious partners?

1 Introduction

It is argued, both strategically and technically, that a gender mainstreaming process is most easily launched in the framework of an explicitly gendered topic. While policy areas such as domestic violence, family policy or health care are said to be explicitly gendered, this seems to be less the case in town and country planning or agricultural policies. What is actually meant with ‘explicitly gendered’ is the extent to which human beings are visible in a given policy area, more precisely men and women, their respective positions in society and how they relate to each other. In domestic violence victims and perpetrators have faces, and the same goes for parents and children or care providers and those in need of care. Explicitly gendered issues are those topics where the impact on roles and positions of subjects is visible at first sight. The impact on gender relations of the persecution of parents who do not fulfil their obligation to pay alimony or of a measure where the perpetrator of domestic violence is legally bound to leave the house at the advantage of the victim are easy to detect. Such an impact is less evident in policy areas where the human being is more difficult to grasp. Does a zoning plan have a different impact in terms of gender? From a feminist perspective it can be argued that all policy fields have an impact on the gender relations prevailing in a given society. This shaping of gender relations can take several forms along a continuum, of which the extremes are a reinforcement of the current gender relations or their tackling. Also, many from feminist perspective self-evident aspects of a gender impact are not detected in practice. Although important, the present contribution will not deal with these considerations. The point is that explicitly gendered topics are supposed to be a good starting point for a gender mainstreaming approach.

The position of wo/men in political decision-making is an explicitly gendered policy issue. The issue at stake is the under-representation of women in processes of political decision-making. This goes for the number and type of women holding political positions, elected or nominated ones. This also goes for the extent to which processes of political decision-making and their outcomes adequately meet the needs and interests of both sexes wherever they might differ. The issue is explicitly gendered in the sense that the different positions of both sexes in political decision-making are visible. In this respect it is no surprise that the last decade witnessed numerous attempts in many countries around the world to tackle the under-representation of women in political decision-making. The focus was thereby mainly on the low number of women. On the whole, the issue of the gender balance in political decision-making has not constantly been a hot issue but it has been on the political agenda of most countries (Lovenduski et al forthcoming).

In this contribution we study the relationship between an explicitly gendered policy issue and gender mainstreaming. More precisely we investigate the extent to which the position of wo/men in political decision-making has been approached from a gender mainstreaming perspective. Our aim is to investigate to what extent an explicitly gendered policy issue, which is considered to be easily gender mainstreamed, is actually approached in such a way in a period when gender mainstreaming is on the agenda. We study the potential relationship between an explicitly gendered policy issue and gender mainstreaming rather than the achievement of policy goals. We are interested in exploring to what extent explicitly gendered policy issues contain windows of opportunities for a gender mainstreaming approach.

We investigate how the issue of wo/men’s position in political decision-making has been dealt with in three countries, the Netherlands, Spain, and Greece. This selection is based on the fact that the position of women in political decision-making is not the same in all three countries and has been dealt with in different ways, while as EU members all of them are confronted with the same policy framework on both wo/men’s position in political decision-making and gender mainstreaming. Therefore, the cross-country approach is not meant to explain variation in the approach of wo/men’s position in relation to different political settings but to maximise the number of approaches. A fourth case are EU policies, given the leading role the EU could be assumed to play in this field, since it pays attention to both gender mainstreaming and the position of wo/men in (political) decision-making.

1995 is the starting point for our analysis because it is mainly the UN World Conference on Women in Beijing which put gender mainstreaming on the agenda. From then on we analyse the political debates on the position of wo/men in political decision-making in the different cases. The aim consists in getting an overview of the framing of the issue, to see whether and where a gender mainstreaming approach is used. The attempt to be exhaustive in the way the issue has been framed explains the broad range of texts (for instance parliamentary debates, bills, government declarations, party programmes, press articles) from a broad range of actors (for instance government, parliament, parties). They must be read as an illustration of framing the issue of wo/men in politics.

The definition of a gender mainstreaming approach is based on the 1996 communication of the European Commission, stating that it “involves not restricting efforts to promote equality to the implementation of specific measures to help women, but mobilising all general policies and measures specifically for the purpose of achieving equality by actively and openly taking into account at the planning stage their possible effects on the respective situation of men and women (gender perspective).” The Communication also states that the “promotion of equality must not be confused with the simple objective of balancing the statistics: it is a question of promoting long-lasting changes in parental roles, family structures, institutional practices, the organisation of work and time, their {women’s} personal development and independence, but also concerns men and the whole of society (…)” (COM(96)67final²). Two elements are of importance in these definitions. First, a gender mainstreaming approach focuses broader than on the social category of women. Second, a gender mainstreaming approach challenges traditional definitions of gender.³ While the 1996 communication of the European Commission mainly reads as solving problems in a larger setting, we assume that this also implies analysing the problem in a larger setting (see infra).

² Link 18/05/2004
³ We recognise that ‘traditional’ is a term that in itself can be put into question, but in the context of this contribution we use it the way it is commonly applied in state feminist circles, i.e. definitions of gender as they have been prevailing over the last decades.
We therefore describe a gender mainstreaming approach as a definition of the policy problem or solution in terms capable of transforming gender biased structures, systems or practices. This perspective would be contrary to policy approaches that specifically focus on the social category of women without taking the larger context into account. Regardless of the particular policy outcomes, we focus on the framing of the problem and of the solution of wo/men’s position in political decision-making, to investigate the extent to which the issue has been defined in general or in specific terms.

The analysis focuses on the way in which the problem and the solution are framed, relying on problem representation as Bacchi (1999) describes it. According to her, problem definition is never simply a matter of defining goals and seeking solutions. It is rather a strategic representation constructed on the basis of presuppositions which are embedded in all policy discourses. The latter are constructed in order to achieve some political goal. The interest of Bacchi’s approach is that it focuses not only ‘upon the representations of those issues that reach the political agenda’, but also upon ‘what does not get problematised’ (Bacchi 1999: 36). She intentionally draws attention to ‘silences in existing political agendas’, and in particular to ‘silences about power relations and gender relations’ (Bacchi 1999: 60).

Drawing on Bacchi’s approach, we explore the framing of the problem of wo/men’s position in political decision-making by asking the following questions: What is represented as a problem in the issue and why is it a problem? To what extent is gender related to it? Is there a shift both in problem representation and in the extent to which gender is related to it? We approach the framing of the solution in a similar way, studying which solutions are suggested, to what extent gender is related to them and whether the last decade has witnessed a shift in these matters. We pay particular attention to shifts in the extent to which either a gender mainstreaming approach has been adopted or openings have been created for it. In this respect, the present contribution is part of a larger project investigating how policy frames relate to and influence the implementation of a gender mainstreaming approach (www.mageeq.net).

When speaking of the position of wo/men in political decision-making, we use the term in a broad sense including what we mentioned earlier on. The cases dealt with use a broad range of terms such as the under-representation of women, women in decision-making, a gender balance in politics. Without distinguishing they mainly have to be read as the number of women participating in political decision-making. We are sensitive to the extent to which the framing of policy issues has an impact on the way in which problems are conceived and solved. Therefore, we use (the position of) wo/men in political decision-making, a gender balance in political decision-making, gender relations in political decision-making broadly unless otherwise stated.

The contribution we want to make is double. Firstly, this paper provides a state of the art of how the issue of gender relations in political decision-making has been dealt with throughout the last decade in a number of EU Member States and at the EU level. Secondly, the paper provides for more precise insights in the potential of explicitly gendered topics for a gender mainstreaming approach. The main argument thereby is that explicitly gendered policy issues contain a benchmarking fallacy. The easiness with which they can be quantified opens the door for an analysis and solution of problems of gender inequality in terms of numbers, without tackling underlying structural problems.

To make this argument, we start with an overview of how the issue of gender relations in political decision-making evolved in the various countries (section 2) followed by an investigation of how the issue is defined as a problem (section 3) and how solutions are framed (section 4). We then discuss the relationship between the issue of wo/men’s position in politics and gender mainstreaming (section 5).
2 Women in political decision-making as an issue

The Netherlands
The Netherlands are often cited as an example of a country with a stable high number of women participating in political decision-making. Having obtained the right to vote and to stand for elections in 1919, the number of women in parliament remained under 10% until the 1970s. By the middle of the 1980s it had risen to 20%. Since the 1990s women make up slightly more than one third of the MPs. During the 1990s this was exceptional among the EU Member States, especially when leaving the Scandinavian countries out (Hoecker 1998). Except for the 1987 elections the share of women Senators has generally been a bit lower than that of their colleagues in parliament. At the 2002 national and local elections, overshadowed by the death of the flamboyant politician Pim Fortuyn, there was a slight backlash of the number of women, but on the whole figures are stable.

Women’s position in political decision-making has hardly been an issue since the middle of the 1990s, while it has been of importance during the 1970s and 1980s. At the 1972 elections the main actor of the Dutch women’s movement (Man-Vrouw-Maatschappij) first campaigned for more women (Oldersma forthcoming). And for the next twenty years it would stimulate parties to pay attention to this issue. Especially the larger parties did so, also pushed by electoral considerations and by their women’s groups (Leyenaar 1998). Since the beginning of the 1990s most parties have measures to promote gender equality, such as quotas or target figures for positions within the parties or for electoral lists. In 1992, the government published a position paper and initiated a project to ‘promote women in politics and in public governance’. It was to be followed by another position paper in 1996, but on the whole gender relations in political decision-making was a non-issue and hardly any policy documents have been published since then. Exceptions are the annual progress reports on ‘women in politics and public governance’ published by the Ministry of Domestic Affairs. Since the 1995 Beijing Conference, only two issues related to women’s position in political decision-making have been debated in parliament. A first dealt with replacing women MPs on maternity leave; a second concerned the legitimacy of the conservative religious party SGP to exclude women from regular party membership (Lamoen and Jeuken 2004). In 1999 the dossier on ‘women in politics and public governance’ was actually closed. From then onwards it was addressed in broader plans for equal opportunities policies.

Spain
Compared to the Netherlands Spain is a very different case. On the one hand, Spain has been one of the EU Member States with a rather low number of women in political decision-making until the end of the 1990s. On the other hand, there has been debate on the position of women. In 1932 women obtained the right to vote and to stand for elections, but studies on the position of women in political decision-making generally take a start when the Franco regime came to an end (Astelarra 1998). From 1977 until the end of the 1980s women made up about 6% of the MPs in the national parliament. During the 1990s their number rose to 15%, to attain 28% in 2000 and 36% in 2004. Hence, over the last few years Spain joined states with a high number of women in elected political positions such as the Netherlands. However, the number of women remains considerably lower in the Senate, making up 23% since the 2004 general elections.

The position of wo/men in political decision-making became an issue at the end of the 1980s. From then onwards debates, fed by parties at the left, mainly focused on quotas. In 1988 the Socialists (PSOE) launched a debate on quotas and approved a 25% minimum quota for women for party functions and for electoral lists. In a reaction the Leftist Party (IU) set a quota of 35% and although the number of women elected did not rise to the quotas set, it started its way upwards (Bustelo et al. 2004). In 1996 the Conservatives (PP) came to power, rejecting what they call the ‘wonder-bra’ quotas. The debate on quotas first entered the legislative arena when the Leftist Party interrogated the Conservatives about their plans to guarantee a higher participation of women in politics in the Women’s Right Committee of Parliament in 1997. The third National Plan for Equal Opportunities (1997-2000) contained a section on ‘power and decision-making’ and several subsequent regional equality plans as well as the fourth national one contained similar sections.

The 1999 municipal and regional elections led to a quotas debate within all parties. Socialist women published articles in the media and the party underlined its support for quotas, a position shared by the Leftist party. The Conservatives repeated their rejection of quotas but increased the number of women candidates on visible positions. The various parties maintained their positions at future elections, but from the late 1990s onwards women members of the Conservatives openly pleaded in favour of quotas. At the occasion of the 2000 general elections parties used quotas as a campaign issue. Changing its statutes, the Leftist party raised its quota. Debates were also influenced by the French parity law but the ‘constitutionalisation’ of the issue of wo/men in political decision-making was tackled with more reluctance than in France (Valiente forthcoming).

In 2000 the Socialists presented a bill for the reform of the national electoral system, which was rejected. At the occasion of the 2002 elections the Socialists adopted an equality plan with a strong commitment for parity democracy. The Socialists and the Leftist party also each submitted a bill on an egalitarian access to electoral positions, but none of them would pass. A mixed group of parliamentarians also presented a bill meant to guarantee men and women equal access to electoral positions, which was also rejected. Regions such as the Baleares and Castilla-La Mancha approved bills including the zipper principle, but they were declared unconstitutional (Bustelo et al. 2004). Finally, from the end of the 1990s onwards the Spanish coordination of the European Women’s Lobby organised seminars analysing issues such as the impact of electoral systems and quotas.

Greece

Greek women obtained full political rights only in 1952 (Pantelidou Maloutas 1998). Until the end of the 1980s the number of women in political decision-making was very low but although the share of women started to increase more recently, it is still considerably lower than in most EU Member States. Until the end of the 1980s women made up no more than 5% of the national MPs. At the occasion of the 1996 elections there were 6% women MPs, to climb to 9% in 2000 and to 13% at the last national elections in March 2004 (www.ipu.org).

Much the same as in Spain the position of wo/men in decision-making became an issue at the end of the 1980s around the question of gender quotas. At the occasion of the 1989 electoral campaign women’s organisations with strong affiliations at the left and women politicians claimed a 35% quotas, a request not supported by feminists from the autonomous movement, insisting on the importance of issues to be defended by women rather than on their sex. The quota was not adopted, amongst others because its advocates did not manage to legitimise the numerical claim (Pantelidou Maloutas et al. 2003). The General Secretariat for Equality also launched a ‘vote for women’ campaign at the occasion of the 1990 elections, but it lacked coordination and did not have an impact. In the run-up to the 1994 European elections women joined across party lines to lobby for women candidates, a strategy that was successful (Leyenaar 2004). This concerted lobbying activity also led to the foundation of a Political Association of Women, which would concentrate on the recruitment of women candidates.
Throughout the 1990s all Greek parties except for the Communists adopted quotas for their decision-making bodies, generally amounting to the share of women party members. Vasso Papandreou, Minister of the Interior, introduced bills on quotas for municipal and regional elections, stipulating a minimum 1/3 presence of members of each sex on the ballots. They provoked little debate in parliament and were voted in 2001. The striking facility with which the bills had been voted is generally put in perspective by factors such as the relative lack of importance of local elections or the strongly pro European profile and modernisation discourse of the main parties. Only the Communists abstained focusing on unemployment policies as being the main point for fighting women’s inequality. Furthermore, the quotas do not have much impact given the fact that they are applied to open lists (Pantelidou Maloutas et al. 2003).

In the same order a bill had been voted in 2000, imposing a 1/3 minimum of women to official advisory boards of state and local government. Recently, equality of men and women became constitutionally endorsed. Article 116 paragraph 2 of the Greek constitution was changed in 2000 imposing the responsibility on the State to take measures for the obliteration of discrimination against women. It implied a legalisation of measures of positive action so as to come to an effective implementation of the principle of equality (Leyenaar 2004; Pantelidou Maloutas et al. 2003).

The European Union

At the first European election in 1979 16.5% of the MEPs were women, considerably more than in many Member States. Since then the number of women has risen steadily to reach 30% at the 1999 elections (www.europarl.eu.int/presentation/default_en.htm 12/05/04). This is more than in the Greek national parliament, but both the Dutch and the Spanish national parliament count more women MPs. Nonetheless, in all three cases the share of national women MPs corresponds to their share of MEPs (http://www.db-decision.de/FactSheets/1999/EP-Results.htm 12/05/04).

At EU level the position of wo/men in political decision-making received attention from the 1990s onwards although there is yet no binding provision (Meier and Paantjens 2004). The third medium-term Community action programme on equal opportunities (1991-1995) was the first of its sort to pay attention to the promotion of women in political decision-making. In this setting the Commission co-financed a large number of activities. Examples are the Expert Network on ‘Women in Decision-Making’ or the ‘European database on women in decision-making’, gathering comparative data, supporting women candidates during European elections and organising conferences. Research was financed on the causes of women’s under-representation in politics and explanations of how to create a gender balance in political decision-making (Leyenaar 1997), on the impact of electoral systems on the position of women (Laver et al. 1999) or, in a broader setting, on the conceptualisation of a gender-conscious European citizenship by Eliane Vogel-Polsky. The European Parliament actually also published a report on the differential impact of electoral systems for both sexes (Garcia Munoz and Carey 1997).

Throughout the 1990s a number of conferences were held under the auspices of the Commission. These were for instance the 1992 European Summit, leading to the Declaration of Athens, the 1996 conference and Charter of Rome, the 1999 Paris conference and Declaration on ‘women and men in power’. In terms of contents all documents request a sharing of political power by both sexes. More interesting is the fact that from the middle of the 1990s onwards these documents were signed by the respective Ministers of Equal Opportunities, which was not the case with the 1992 Declaration of Athens.

At the level of initiatives launched within the European institutions there first was the 1994 European Parliament’ Committee on Women’s Rights report on ‘women in decision-making’, requesting an integrated approach to increase the number of women in decision-making positions. The conclusions were summarised in a resolution by the European Parliament, influencing the 1995 Council resolution on the balanced participation of men and women in decision-making. It was followed by the 1996 Council Recommendation on the balanced participation of women and men in decision-making inviting both the Member States and the EU institutions and bodies to develop an integrated approach to promote it. In total, the European Parliament so far initiated three resolutions on the issue of women’s position in political decision-making. A second one was voted in March 2000, which was the first to suggest quotas as a transitional measure to bring more women into politics. A third resolution was adopted in 2001, drawing conclusions from the Commission report on the implementation of the 1996 Council recommendation. A similar attempt to establish the state of the art of women’s position in political decision-making had been undertaken by the Finnish Presidency in 1999 when presenting indicators to measure and monitor the follow-up of the Beijing Platform for Action by the Member States. In the summer of 2000 the Commission had also adopted a decision and communication on reaching a ‘gender balance’ within its committees and expert groups. Finally, with an eye on the 2004 European elections the Committee on Women’s Rights and Equal Opportunities presented a report on how to ensure a balanced participation of women candidates in the elections.

In sum, over the last decade some although diverse attention has been paid to the issue of women’s position in political decision-making in all cases studied. This broad approach of the topic provides for an interesting range of cases. The following sections analyse in detail how the issue has been framed.

3 What is the problem with women in political decision-making?

Our analysis of the conceptualisation of women’s position in political decision-making in Spain, Greece, the Netherlands and the European Union, starts by asking the following questions: What is represented as a problem? Why is it a problem? To what extent is gender related to it? Is there a shift both in problem representation and in the extent to which gender is related to it?

With regard to the ‘what?’ question, the texts taken into consideration share the fact that the diagnosis of the problem is rather underdeveloped in comparison to the prognosis. The analysis of what is the problem is often limited to the conclusion that women are ‘under-represented in (political) decision-making’, meaning that there are too few women, with a slightly different emphasis in the various cases. In the Netherlands, government’s policy to promote women’s participation in politics and public governance is framed predominantly in terms of ‘arrears’, while a more substantial diagnosis than the one stating that women are lagging behind in terms of representation/participation is hardly ever provided (Lamoen and Jeuken 2004). The same goes for EU documents, also pointing at the persistence of imbalanced gender relations in politics. Sometimes the problem definition shifts to the limited monitoring and assessment of policies meant to raise the number of women in politics, as in the follow-up of the Beijing Platform for Action (Meier and Paantjens 2004). In Spain, the general problem is the ‘under-representation’ of women in high positions in the labour market both in private enterprises and in public administrations (e.g. one of the measures of the National Equality Plans is to promote MBA for women), while the most specifically political problem is women’s ‘under-representation’ in political parties’ lists and positions, and in national and regional Parliaments and Municipalities (Bustelo et al. 2004).

Greece places the emphasis on women’s lack of equal opportunities to participate with men in political decision-making (Pantelidou et al. 2004). This stress is due to the fact that part of the Greek reasoning of why women’s ‘under-representation’ is a problem is that it is undemocratic, as democracy requires citizens with equal rights and opportunities. As a consequence, women’s lack of equal opportunities is a problem for the quality of democracy. However, it seems that the framing of the issue greatly varies depending on the occasion. The problem tends to be presented as a democracy issue when for instance the pro-quota speaker addresses an audience that is perceived as not necessarily friendly to quotas, such as the Greek Parliament, as a devise to pass legislation through. In other occasions the problem is mainly presented as an equality issue. For instance, Vaso Papandreou, the minister who introduced quotas, emphasizes the democracy argument in a speech made in Parliament4 and the equality argument at the Conference organised by the Union of Greek Women and the European Women’s Lobby on ‘women in posts of responsibility’ (Pantelidou et al. 2004). Thus, conceptualising quotas as a democracy issue could be a ‘strategic framing’ to gain the greatest possible support in favour of quotas, democracy being more attractive than gender equality.

When it comes to justifying why women’s ‘under-representation’ is a problem, appeals to democracy and equality are the main references for all countries, although in some other cases there seems to be no need for presenting reasons and arguments. In the EU texts, the ‘under-representation’ of women is considered to be a problem because balanced participation is perceived as being a condition for or a founding principle of equality, while at the same time it reflects the under-utilisation of human resources (Meier and Paantjens 2004). A balanced participation of both sexes is also defined as a necessary step towards democracy.

In the Netherlands there is almost no conceptualisation of why it is a problem, only one text refers to the democracy argument. The Dutch government hardly feels the need to argue why involving more women in political decision-making is necessary; it is simply seen as something that needs to be done. In Spain there is a divide between the conservative party (PP) and the socialist and leftist parties (PSOE and IU). The liberal discourse of the conservative party is that women’s under-representation is not a problem, while the problem is that women have not been competing with men on equal bases. Once capable individuals are left free to compete for power, those who are ‘worth it’ will find the way to power positions and change will come ‘naturally’. According to the Spanish left wing parties, the ‘under-representation’ of women is problematic both because it reveals the existence of a democratic deficit, and because it is a sign of inequality, discrimination and exclusion from citizenship. No further elaboration is provided, though.

In addition to the main problem of women’s ‘under-representation’, other issues are represented as problematic in relation to women’s position in political decision-making in the Netherlands. These are the adoption of a replacement arrangement for politicians on pregnancy and delivery leave and the legitimacy of the conservative Christian party (SGP) excluding women from regular membership. The Dutch government tends to frame the first problem in terms of ‘women as arrears’. Rather than pointing to the indirectly discriminatory effect of not having arranged for a pregnancy and delivery leave, the government pictures it as a ‘supportive measure’ for women, enabling them to make better use of their passive suffrage, and possibly stimulating women’s participation. The reason for putting into question the exclusionary clause of the SGP appears to be the need to react to the CEDAW-Commission’s criticism for allowing it to exclude women from regular membership, rather than an interest in ensuring gender equality. The Dutch government, as a matter of fact, has not taken action against the SGP’s discriminatory provision, but has rather appealed to the ‘sometimes competing nature’ of different fundamental rights, such as the freedom of association, the freedom of religion, and the right to equality. By allowing the status quo to continue, the government is implicitly prioritising the former two rights over the latter.

The explanation of why women’s political ‘under-representation’ is a problem is dealt with in divergent ways. Half of the documents do not provide an explanation. The others mention a panoply of causes, generally without elaborating them in detail. A first set of causes mentioned in EU and Dutch documents are of a structural nature, referring to electoral systems, party structures and selection mechanisms. A second set of causes mentioned cover more broadly attitudes, social behaviour or ‘mentality’, referring to the perception of women candidates by parties, voters and society at large. A third set of causes refers to gender-related role and task divisions, mentioning the traditional division of roles, the reconciliation of work and family. A Greek intervention during the quota debate states that women’s roles are an obstacle for the political participation of women (Pantelidou Maloutas et al. 2004), but Spanish documents mention the same explanation. In more broad terms some Spanish texts point at patriarchal values and the patriarchal structure of society, thereby indicating the normative basis of the gendered division of roles and tasks, without however going into detail on this point. A number of EU documents also mention insufficient state support or policies as a cause for mainly the persistence of women’s under-representation in politics. While many causes are an interesting starting point for a gender analysis of the causes of the number of women in political decision-making, they are generally dealt with in a superficial way. Finally, several documents deal with causal relationships in more generic terms, stating that the conditions for participation are lacking. Others refer to gender-specific thresholds and barriers or to women’s late access to civil rights and historic inequality.

In most cases a responsible is designated, although not necessarily explicitly. Governments, parties, public authorities in general or civil society are blamed for the problem, not providing for equal opportunities for women. Often, be it implicitly, men are pointed at, but in too general terms to be an analytical category. Less frequently women are supposed to cause their low number in political decision-making, being invited to act. Interestingly, abstract entities such as society or social structures are also designated as being to blame (Bustelo et al. 2004; Meier and Paantjens 2004).

In the problem diagnosis gender is addressed similarly for all the cases considered. Women tend to be seen as the main problem holders, lacking opportunities to equally participate in politics, while men (at least implicitly) tend to be seen as the norm group to which women must aspire to. The problem, as it is represented, is that women do not have access to male positions. The strength of this male standard is shown in the fact that men are generally left out of the picture. Furthermore, change is left in women’s hands (Bustelo et al. 2004). This is reflected in a Spanish parliamentary debate, in which it is argued that women are needed in politics because this would ‘feminise’ politics, thus producing a qualitative change. It is not about changing patriarchal values, but to mix them with ‘women’s values’ (which are not explicitly defined). The conclusion is that men cannot and should not change, but women should make politics more ‘human’. This change is not regarded as easy, since, as emerges from the Greek texts, women must face both social (lack of welfare provisions) and psychological (personal insecurities) obstacles to participate in politics (Pantelidou et al. 2004). Interestingly, none of the texts analysed mentions the possible ‘psychological’ obstacles of men that prevent them from sharing power with women.

Men are attributed a double normative standard. They do not only do more than women, they do too much. On the one hand, they are the norm group because women must participate in decision-making to a higher extent, much the same as men do. On the other hand, it is men who dominate positions of decision-making. But this male domination is not put into question (Meier and Paantjens 2004).
Furthermore, several texts, at least implicitly, contain essentialist definitions of gender. For instance, in the EU, gender is addressed as a social category at an explicit level, but as an identity at an implicit level. This is reflected in the argument that a balanced participation of women in decision-making will lead to the consideration of the interests and needs of the entire population. The attribution of such an essentialist representation of interests on the part of both sexes reflects the conception of gender as an identity (Meier and Paantjens 2004). Women are thought to be essentially different and hold different values than men, which is also the case in Greece and Spain. The texts, however, do not provide further explanations for the reasons of this difference.

On the whole, with the exception of the European Union, the cases considered do not present significant shifts in their framing of women’s political participation that could reveal the effective adoption of a gender mainstreaming approach. Changes consist of interesting evolutions, but not sufficiently elaborated as to have an impact on the general frame, as in the Netherlands and Greece. Whenever changes are sufficiently elaborated in terms of content, they are limited to regionally restricted shifts towards mainstreaming, like in Spain, or to non-binding documents, like in the EU.

In the Netherlands, two new concepts have recently emerged in the governmental discourse on women’s participation in political decision-making, although they did not have a significant impact on the general frame of ‘women as arrears’ (Lamoen and Jeuken 2004). The first one is the notion of ‘diversity’ that increasingly overshadows the initial focus on women’s participation. At first sight this concept seems to open the way to link gender to other in- and exclusionary mechanisms in society. In practice, however, the notion of diversity appears to be translated primarily in terms of promoting the participation of (women from) ethnic minorities. Suggesting that women might bring in different voices in political decision-making does not legitimize the policy of ‘diversity’: the frame is still structured around equality rather than difference. The second concept that is increasingly mentioned is the notion of ‘cultural change’, which often refers to the diversity among representatives. Though officially aimed at preventing the quick exit of women, the pilot studies as described in policy documents tend to be targeted largely at promoting a varied composition of representative bodies. Moreover, in the emancipation policy framing of the issue, and specifically in the Mid Term Policy Plan on Emancipation (2000), shifts in political power are mentioned in the diagnosis as relevant factors to consider in the realm of decision making, but not so much in the prognosis. Current Dutch policy initiatives are still framed in terms of integrating ethnic minorities/women in existing political structures and practices, rather than more radically challenging the status quo.

In Greece there have been important changes in gender policy and there are increasingly more debates on mainstreaming, a significant factor being the willingness to comply with EU legislation. This attitude can lead to a stronger Europeanisation of Greek gender policy and, in general, it shows a certain positive consideration of gender equality on the part of policymakers. The design and implementation of gender policy in Greece has been guided by the framing of equality in terms of women’s ‘difference’. In this context gender is conceptualised as a clear dichotomy, with specific roles and duties belonging to each side of the dichotomy, without putting into question prevailing conceptions of gender. This has favoured the legitimisation of a traditional perception of women and their roles, by limiting gender policy mainly to provisions that help women to fulfil their ascribed roles. Thus, there is no serious challenging of the existing substance of gender roles. This might explain why traditional frames persist even within discourses that intend to be progressive towards gender equality (Pantelidou et al. 2004). Intrinsically, the Greek case, much the same as the Dutch one, contains shifts in the framing of the issue of women’s position in political decision-making, which could be a window of opportunity for a gender mainstreaming approach. The Greek reference to concepts such as democracy or equality could be an opening for gender mainstreaming, as does the introduction of the concept of diversity in Dutch policies. Both concepts allow for a broader approach of the problem of wo/men’s position in political decision-making instead of narrowing it down to special policies targeted at women. However, in neither case the introduction of these concepts leads to a gender mainstreaming approach.

In Spain there is a shift of perspective from the national to the Basque regional equality plan as the latter focuses on the lack of women’s empowerment and the presence of male domination in power positions as obstacles to women’s participation (Bustelo et al. 2004). Although it does not explicitly mention the patriarchal structures in which power relations are situated, the Basque plan claims that gender relations are power relations, thus showing a greater attention to the structural causes of inequality. This opens the way to a more global approach to the problem of political participation, in the direction of a gender mainstreaming perspective, to which the plan explicitly refers. As stated in the plan, the problem of women’s ‘under-representation’ in all fields is caused by the lack of substantive equality of social structures, by the obstacles that public administrations pose to women’s participation, and, finally, by women’s lack of empowerment that hinders a more assertive claiming of their needs.

This is already a broader diagnosis of the problem than the one that emerges from the national equality plans, but there is one more interesting evolution, though still at an embryonic stage of elaboration. Related to the concept of empowerment are the concepts of ‘power over’ and ‘power to’. According to the indications of the plan, women’s empowerment should take its point of departure from the concept of ‘power to’. Women are supposed to exercise ‘power to’, rather than ‘power over’, but as they are acting within the same structures as men, dominating structures would need to turn less hierarchical in order for women - and men - to exercise ‘power to’. There is no further elaboration, however, of the implications of the notion of ‘power to’, nor of the kind of change of structures that would be necessary to enable both women and men to exercise this type of power.

Finally, the text also underlines that the way gender is currently constructed and how this construction is perceived are an obstacle to power. Without going further into detail, this text is one of the few examples where the construction of gender is underlined and put into question instead of parting from fixed – or even essentialist – definitions of men and women. A similar analysis can be found in the Spanish Leftist Party’s programme for the 2004 general elections (Bustelo et al. 2004).

The European Union presents most shifts in the framing of women’s participation towards a more holistic approach to the problem, although not in its binding documents. It is probably not coincidental that most of the EU documents that show an evolution towards a gender mainstreaming approach are produced in the two years after Beijing, when the dictates of the platform are still fresh. Council Recommendation 96/694 of 2 December 1996 on the balanced participation of women and men in the decision-making process, for example, asked the Member States to develop an integrated approach to promote a balanced participation of women and men in decision-making. A similar standpoint is taken in the Report from the Commission to the Council, the European Parliament and the Economic and Social Committee on the implementation of Council recommendation 96/694, where it is concluded that ‘(T)he problem of under-representation of women in decision-making posts is structural and multifaceted. It has to be tackled at the same time in all its aspects both in terms of political and social mechanisms and in terms of (…) changes of attitudes and behaviours’.

The Charter of Rome on ‘women for the renewal of politics and society’, signed by the women Ministers of the European Union Member States on 17 May 1996, is innovative in its diagnosis, since it is one of the few documents where the reverse side of women’s low presence in decision-making is explicitly mentioned. Male domination of political life and decision-making is represented as the problem, together with women’s ‘under-representation’ in these areas.

However, the EU text that shows a more significant shift towards a gender mainstreaming perspective is the 1997 brochure on how to create a gender balance in political decision-making. It contains a very broad analysis of the problem. A number of both institutional and individual factors explain the low presence of women in decision-making, in the recruitment, selection and election process of political candidates. The brochure explicitly links the problem to the gender division of labour and the gender division of domestic work. Similar analyses, though in a more embryonic stage can also be found in the Spanish Socialist Party’s electoral programme for the 2004 general elections pointing at patriarchal structures and traditions (Bustelo et al. 2004). Interestingly, interests and needs of women are not related to an intrinsic female identity, but rather they are attributed to women’s experiences in life, which are linked to the gender division of tasks and roles. Moreover, many behavioural or normative dimensions of gender are recognised and defined as dependent on institutional factors. The text proves that a lot of information is available when it comes to the issue of wo/men’s position in political decision-making. However, although the brochure was financed by the European Commission, little of this information trickles down in subsequent policy initiatives emanating from the EU institutions. An exception to this are the reports written by the European Parliament’s Committee on Women’s Rights and Equal Opportunities, such as the one preparing the 2004 European elections, or resolutions of the European Parliament such as the one from March 2000.

4 How are solutions for women in political decision-making framed?

We analyse the framing of the solutions proposed for dealing with the problem of wo/men’s position in political decision-making similar to the problem analysis. Hence, we study which solutions are suggested, to what extent gender is related to them and whether the last decade has witnessed a shift in these matters.

On the whole, the ‘what to do’ question receives more attention than the problem analysis itself. Policy documents rather focus on prognosis than on diagnosis. The overall goal is generally consistent with the definition of the problem; it is to increase the number of women in decision-making. At an abstract level it is framed as equality but most texts translate this as a need for more women in political decision-making or for a balanced participation. Many documents interchangeably use terms such as parity and equality, standing for anything from more women via balanced participation to equal participation. In several cases the goal to achieve must be read between the lines, for instance in the European Parliament’s resolution of March 2000 on women in decision-making. In certain cases the goal is framed in broader terms, such as the Dutch efforts to promote diversity. But some goals also adopt a more technical and in that respect limited focus, a nice illustration of which is the Finnish European Union presidency report on how to follow up the implementation of the Beijing Platform for Action by the Member States. The goal is reduced to the collection of data on the position of women in the Member States. It does not define a goal to be attained in this field or how to measure progress. The report further contains no explanation on how these indicators will help Member States to make the step from observing women’s low numbers to achieving a balanced participation of both sexes. The action is limited to measure the position of women in political decision-making, not to enhance it. The data collection becomes a goal in itself. Similarly, in a Dutch debate in the Second Chamber the goal is limited to reaching the target figures set out (Lamoen and Yeuken 2004).
When it comes to solving the problem of women’s low numbers, a thorough analysis of what is concretely to be done is hardly found. Many documents contain vague statements such as ‘considering how policies could be initiated’, ‘new initiatives developed’, or confirm that the ‘necessary steps will be taken’, as in the Charter of Rome (Meier and Paantjens 2004). Others simply repeat the goal itself, going for the ‘promotion of a more balanced participation’. Such statements are hollow promises, what-to-do-statements without any clear commitment in terms of what, when, how, by whom, and by which means (Lamoen and Yeukon 2004). Examples of these claims, mainly provided by the executives, can be found in all cases studied. In Spain, the prognosis in the official documents (equality plans launched by the national and regional executives) contains far-reaching goals but few strategies to achieve them. The actions proposed include the analysis of the barriers to the participation of women in decision-making processes, the promotion of women’s training to achieve decision-making positions, the spreading of good practices and experiences, the support to NGOs that promote women staff, the improvement of statistical data in order to determine the progress of women’s incorporation in decision-making. Little is said of how these goals will be achieved.

Other documents do the opposite and present a host of concrete measures to achieve a balance in decision-making, typical illustrations of which are equal opportunities’ policy plans or resolutions of the European Parliament. Lists of measures contain in various combinations and changing order: long-term political commitment, study, monitor and analyse the position of women in decision-making, develop sensitising and mobilising measures, provide education and training, adapt recruitment and selection procedures within political parties, change electoral systems, adopt target figures or quotas, exchange experiences, develop legislation meant to achieve equal rights of men and women, facilitate the combination of politics and family, or, more generally, work and family. Especially Greek proposals also focus on social welfare provisions, although the focus on the analysed documents is on quotas as a temporary remedy for the low numbers of women (Pantelidou Maloutas et al 2004).

In many cases these enumerations of measures resemble a shopping list rather than a comprehensive policy strategy, since they lack an explanation of how these measures will solve the problem. The Commission report on the implementation of Council recommendation 96/694 actually recommends the simultaneous adoption of a comprehensive integrated strategy and a mix of concrete measures. The report does not explain how this mix of policy measures relates to a comprehensive integrated strategy. Neither does it address the issue of how these measures will concretely solve the problem of women’s position in political decision-making (Meier and Paantjens 2004). Nonetheless, although diagnosis is often missing, many cases suggest a comprehensive and integrated approach to the problem. However, without concrete measures of how to put it into practice, a broad approach to the solution and gender mainstreaming are but a slogan. The only tangible solution offered in Greece and Spain, refers to quotas in political parties and electoral systems. If other solutions are mentioned, like increasing welfare provisions for women or intervening in the education system in Greece, or promoting women’s training or encouraging them to participate in Spain, these are vague.

Most concrete comprehensive approaches can actually be found in documents from civil society actors or scientists. A commonly heard argument is that to achieve parity the participation of women must be promoted, but this should not be dissociated from other problems and their solution. The European Women’s Lobby, for instance, refers to the elimination of discrimination of girls in education, the elimination of the pay gap and the increased sharing of family responsibilities. To achieve a parity democracy, a global strategy is required. Not only quotas or target figures are needed, but also constitutional and legal or attitudinal changes (Meier and Paantjens 2004). Even more elaborated is the EU brochure on how to reach a gender balance in politics. It contains not only an important list of measures to take but explains for all of them why they are helpful and how they should be put into practice. These various types of measures are further explained in detail and illustrated with examples of good practice.

However, a general rule is that the more concrete suggestions for improving the gender balance in political decision-making, the less binding the document. Similarly, solutions that are far-reaching in terms of changing male standards only figure in documents without binding value. And the more imperative a solution, the less far-reaching it is, which is nicely illustrated by the communication the Commission addresses to the Member States in July 2000 on achieving a gender balance within its committees and expert groups. The Commission actively wants to promote equality. The communication defines ‘balanced participation’ as a 40% ‘minimum level of participation of women or men in committees and expert groups’. Hence, the equality of women, of which the European Community considers itself to be a prime promoter, is defined as a participation of minimum 40% of women in the committees and expert groups. The communication specifies that in order to achieve this goal, four candidates should be put forward for each position, among which should be at least one of each sex. The communication is a good example of how abstract principles of equality can be progressively diluted when put into practice. Equality becomes at least one candidate of each sex among four candidates, with the further limits that the qualification of nominees should prime on gender balance and that the Commission does not interfere with Member States’ or other organisations’ liberty to put forward candidates of their choice.

The communication of the Commission reveals two other important features of how solutions are framed. Firstly, most concrete solutions exclusively frame the issue in visible results or in quantitative terms, namely increasing the number of women in decision-making. Secondly, most governments and EU institutions see but a supportive role for themselves when it comes to achieving a gender balance. With respect to the first, as the goal is to increase the number of women in decision-making, the mechanism mentioned in most of the cases is quotas. Quotas and target figures appear in all four cases as a major solution, but in some cases like Spain where quotas are put in question or are not permitted in the official discourse, solutions are more abstract. Solutions then consist in encouraging women to participate but are still targeted to a numerical increase of women in decision-making positions. In the Dutch case, where the 2000 midterm policy plan on emancipation set a number of target figures, reaching them becomes the goal, illustrating well the quantification of the issue.

The second feature that was mentioned, i.e. the lack of concrete and far-reaching solutions, is shown by the fact that governments and EU institutions see but a supportive role for themselves. They have to create the climate allowing for a promotion of women in political decision-making, by providing conditions such as earmarked financial support. The Dutch government passes the buck on to political parties; the European Union considers that the responsibility for solving the problem is mainly with the Member States or civil society in the broad sense. Hereby both the women’s movement but also other organisations are thought of, as became clear with the issue of nominating candidates for EU committees and expert groups. In the Greek case parliament and MPs are considered to be the main actors, which is due to the fact that the issue at stake is the voting of a quotas bill. The same goes for the Spanish debates on quotas. Interestingly, texts emanating from women’s movements and 6 By 2010 there should be 50% women in the national parliament, the European parliament and the provincial councils, and 45% women in municipal councils. Cabinets should count 50% women; there should be 40% city mayors, and 30% commissioners of the Queen (Lamoen and Yeuken 2004).

feminists see an important role for the executives, including far-reaching interventions in the organisation of political decision-making, of the labour market and of the private sphere. However, like in the Spanish case, the executives limit themselves to very vague goals and interventions. The only concrete solution, quotas, remains in the political parties and electoral system realms.

When concrete solutions have a high chance of being put into practice, women are statistical variables, and the issue is one of counting and increasing the number of women without taking gender into account. Target figures or quotas are set without concretely tackling the causes of women’s position in political decision-making. A nice illustration of this is the Dutch focus on reaching target figures. The male standard depicted in problem diagnosis filters through the framing of solutions as well, such as in the Dutch debate on pregnancy and maternity leave. Initially meant to be a supportive measure for women, participation in international organisations such as UN delegations is excluded from it. The government thereby stresses the need for representatives to be present as often as possible, not allowing for a ‘civil service mentality’ (Lamoen and Yeuken 2004). A measure meant to improve a gender balance does not question the standard only reachable for those not having children.

Another indicator that gender is not really taken into account in the way the solution is framed is that there is a tendency to consider almost exclusively women as the target group of the solutions proposed. Although in the diagnosis there might be some analysis about the causes of women’s low numbers based on social structures and gender relations, in the prognosis most of the solutions are especially targeted at women; in other words, the solution depends on them. Furthermore, most of the times the term ‘gender’ is used as a social category and could be interchangeable with ‘sex’. A nice illustration of this is the insistence of Spanish equality plans on ‘encouraging women to participate’.

The various cases considered present a number of shifts over time, but there are no significant shifts in the framing of wo/men’s position in political decision-making that could reveal the effective adoption of a gender mainstreaming approach. On the contrary, the case of the European Union reveals a shift away from a broad and comprehensive gender mainstreaming approach. While right after 1995 documents recognise the need for a comprehensive integrated approach of the problem of women’s low numbers in political decision-making, more recent texts focus on quotas for women as a target group. This more recent quantification of the issue in specific terms can be found in the Finnish Presidency report on how to monitor the follow up of the Beijing Platform for Action by the Member States or in the Commission’s communication on the composition of its expert groups and committees, while official documents of the European Parliament start putting quotas or target figures forward. However, this shift of framing does not illustrate the fact that the EU buried a gender mainstreaming approach. It actually reveals that it never adopted one when it comes to achieving a gender balance in political decision-making. The shift in framing is due to the fact that more recent documents are less of a general statement and contain more concrete measures to be taken. While the EU adopted a broad comprehensive approach to solving the problem of a gender balance when it comes to words, it switched to specific measures targeting women as quantifiable units when it comes to deeds.

In Spain, the official discourse on quotas has recently changed due to the radical shift provoked by general elections in March 2004. The newly elected Spanish Socialist Government not only has traditionally been in favour of quotas, but has also provided some explicit signs of the importance it wants to give to women’s participation in politics (parity among ministers, the first woman vice-president). However, although the political context has clearly become more favourable, solutions are still framed in almost exclusively quantitative terms without containing a gender mainstreaming approach.
The Dutch case contains no fundamental shift when it comes to framing solutions. Issues such as diversity are not elaborated on in the solutions, which focus on the number of women. Potential openings for a gender mainstreaming approach such as the realisation of a pregnancy and maternity leave are not seized to tackle problems in a more comprehensive context. On the contrary, they further entrench male standards and prerogatives. In the Greek case there seem to be no shifts in framing solutions either.

5 Women in political decision-making and the benchmarking fallacy

In order to cover a gender mainstreaming approach, the position of wo/men in political decision-making should have been dealt with in general terms so as to transform patriarchal structures, systems or practices. To what extent has the issue been dealt with in general terms instead of specific ones? To what extent did the various documents focus broader than the social category of women? To what extent were traditional definitions of gender challenged, for instance in the organisation of work and time, parental roles or family structures, institutional practices, etc? What did (not) get problematised regarding the issue of women’s participation in politics, especially when it comes to gender relations? And which presuppositions were embedded in the construction of problems and solutions?

On the whole, and with the exception of the European Union, there are no significant shifts in the framing of wo/men’s position in political decision-making that could reveal the effective adoption of a gender mainstreaming approach. Most documents still approach the issue as a specific policy issue, focusing on the social category of women without taking the larger context into account. Whenever this is not done at the level of problem definition, the broader focus gets lost when it comes to solving the problem. In many cases the problem itself is defined as women’s under-representation in politics, meaning too few women. Sometimes it is framed as imbalanced gender relations in politics, but the equivalent of women’s ‘under-representation’, i.e. men’s ‘over-representation’, is not mentioned. The issue is simply one of too few women, not of too many men. As such the invocation of men would not signify that the issue is placed in a larger perspective, but the single focus on women is an indicator for the way in which the issue has been dealt with. The single focus on women can, in several cases, be found back in the problem’s causes, which implies that women have to take up their responsibility and act (either by going into politics or by helping other women to enter politics more smoothly).

Interestingly, however, and in contrast to the way in which the issue is generally dealt with, the justification and explanation of the problem of women’s low numbers is often framed in broader terms than the problem itself. The problem is mainly justified because it reveals a deficient functioning of democracy or a non-compliance with the principle of equality. These arguments, as old as they might be (see for instance Degauquier 1994), imply a putting into question of their prevailing conceptualisation. Democracy, as put forward in the justification for why women’s low numbers are problematic, implies the participation of both sexes and therefore a putting into question of the ideas or identities on which representation has been based. In the same order equality implies a putting into question of the abstract and formal definition of citizens. However, the constitutional state is not profoundly put into question. Reference to concepts such as democracy and equality underlines the existence of noble-minded or relevant goals rather than the concrete questioning of founding principles and how their prevailing conceptualisation influences societal gender relations.

The explanation of women’s low numbers also reveals a broader perspective on the issue than a narrow focus on women. Examples of this are the recurrent references to structural factors, implying that the problem situates itself outside the individual woman.
Reference is made to electoral systems, to party systems and structures, and their differential impact on men and women, or, more broadly, the extent to which they stimulate diversity. The same goes for gender-related role and task divisions, the patriarchal structure of society, or more broadly attitudes and social behaviour, that refer to the extent to which gender regimes shape individual life choices. But again, although these causes are an interesting starting point for a gender analysis of women’s low numbers in political decision-making, they are generally dealt with in a superficial way. Mentioned but not explored in depth, gender regimes are for instance sketched as the bogeyman but not put into question. And whenever the latter is the case, the document has no binding value, like the EU brochure on how to close the gender gap in politics. Even more revealing for the lack of diagnosis is the fact that problem analysis is missing in many cases. Diagnosis might by definition be less elaborated on than prognosis in policy documents, but the pro-active approach of gender mainstreaming on gender regimes requires a sound knowledge of their current shaping and reproduction (see also Verloo and Roggeband 2004). Neither does a limited focus on problem analysis in policy documents imply that the actual causes are left aside in the delineation of solutions (see infra).

The broad approach of problem diagnosis is not prolonged in the way gender is dealt with. In most cases sex is a quantifiable variable and women are addressed as a social category. Gender relations are pointed at as one of the causes of women’s low numbers, but they are not challenged. In several cases the traditional gender roles are even crystallised out. The Greek debate on quotas, for instance, did not challenge the traditional gender regime but was limited to find a way to help women get more involved in political decision-making within the setting of traditional gender roles. Moreover, the traditionally different gender role of women was meant to justify their participation in politics. The same goes for other cases, especially European documents, in which traditional gender roles are presented in a way that legitimises their essentialist perception. The argument that a balanced participation of women in decision-making will lead to the consideration of the interests and needs of the entire population awards intrinsic interests and needs as well as their perception and articulation to sex. The fact that women are needed in order to look after their own interests and needs implies a shortcoming of men at this level. The argument that more women in political decision-making will broaden the scope of subjects dealt with and the way in which they are approached is as old as the democracy and equality argument. Meanwhile it has been elaborated theoretically, to get rid of essentialist connotations (see for instance Phillips 1998, Sawer 2000), as is also shown in the EU brochure on how to create a gender balance. Furthermore, in defence of most cases it can be said that the argument of sex-related interests and needs is rather meant to justify action than to shape it.

Nonetheless, gender regimes are not put into question in most cases, and often action is guided by stereotyped conceptions of gender. Stereotyped (and essentialist) definitions of gender imply narrow conceptions of women and men that risk to be conceived as unchangeable, because traditionally or essentially given. This by definition undermines a gender mainstreaming perspective which is meant to (have the potential to) tackle traditional gender regimes. The tackling of traditional roles implies the recognition that they are changeable and thus have no intrinsic nature. Gender mainstreaming requires the presupposition that men, women and their relations are socially constructed and shaped and can therefore be de- and reconstructed. Otherwise a gender mainstreaming approach cannot have a transformative impact on traditional gender relations and misses its main aim. In this respect, recognising the malleable character of gender definitions is a prerequisite for potential changes that a gender mainstreaming approach can provoke. The Basque policy plan is a good example, because it points at the fact that the way gender is constructed is an obstacle to power for women, thereby recognising not only the malleable character of gender relations but the extent to which certain constructions allow for access to power while others do not.

We have claimed that gender mainstreaming is a strategy that aims at transforming traditional gender regimes. Other than that, the challenging of patriarchal concepts, structures, institutions, meanings, goals, and social relationships is at the core of feminism itself, a movement whose aim is the transformation and reconstruction of social reality according to concepts, social structures and relationships free from the domination and oppression of one sex over the other. In this respect, the de- and re-construction of public and private spheres is a feminist aim that has affected the definition of a gender mainstreaming approach. This means that, when gender mainstreaming is applied in a way that does not aim at challenging traditional gender roles, like in the case of women’s political participation, the feminist core of its meaning gets lost, thus limiting the revolutionary potential of the strategy.

Central in the dealing with gender is the fact that the extent to which society and politics are guided by a male standard is not put into question. On the contrary, it is presupposed to be the norm, be it not overtly or explicitly. The problem with framing equality as assimilation is precisely the existence of an unquestioned male norm that women must either imitate or be compensated for not attaining (Mackinnon 1987). Any difference from such an absolute norm is interpreted and treated as deviance, anomaly, and inferiority. The taken for granted attitude towards the male standard is shown in the fact that men are no part of the picture. Women are framed as being the exception, but they are not overtly compared to the norm. In several cases the male standard is not even recognised, such as when the Spanish Conservatives argue that there is no problem for women and their participation in political decision-making. Most cases frame the issue as women being arrears. Some of the reasons explaining this lagging behind of women touch upon the male standard, such as the recognition that the requirements for candidates are ‘to be like men’. However, the male standard is broadly accepted as given instead of being questioned, as is shown in the Dutch framing of a replacement arrangement for politicians on pregnancy and delivery leave. The problem of women lagging behind has to be overcome, but the solution proposed does not target the roots of the latter. On the contrary, in many cases prognosis strengthens the male standard. Men are not requested to make any effort let alone to change: the gender gap has to be tackled and closed by women. Even the Dutch goal of diversity contains a (particular) male standard, as women are expected to be equal to men. Realising the impact of gender regimes on political decision-making implies the recognition and putting into question of a male standard. It is further central to a gender mainstreaming approach, and a condition for gender equality.

In sum, the main problem at the level of diagnosis consists in a lack of gender analysis, putting into question basic assumptions underlying and structuring the current gender regimes. The dominant framing of the problem has an impact on the solutions suggested. Solutions, whenever they are concrete, focus on women as statistical variables, and the issue is one of counting and increasing the number of women without actually taking gender into account. Quotas and target figures appear in all four cases as a major solution without tackling the causes of the low number of women. The lack of linking problem diagnosis and prognosis is also shown in the fact that pointing at different causes does not withhold most actors to all suggest the same type of solution, namely quotas and target figures. While many solutions presented in shopping lists actually are windows of opportunities for a gender mainstreaming approach, those finally withheld and put into practice simply frame the issue in quantitative terms leaving aside a broader perspective.

There are several explanations for the emphasis on numbers in the prognosis. A main point is the fact that explicitly gendered policy issues contain a benchmarking fallacy. Policy issues where members of at least one sex are easy to trace and target facilitate the quantification of the issue. The easiness with which they can be quantified opens the door for a problem analysis and solution in terms of numbers without tackling underlying structural problems. The issue becomes one of numbers of wo/men in part-time work or in higher education, as library users or health care consumers, dealing with the problem at the surface instead of going down to the causes of gender inequality. The same goes for the position of wo/men in political decision-making, focusing on the number of women candidates instead of tackling the gendered character of political systems, structures and traditions. The term ‘explicitly gendered’ policy issue actually reveals that sex and not gender is evident and therefore obvious to tackle. In this respect, we should speak of policy issues where members of at least one sex are easy to trace and target.

This benchmarking fallacy is strengthened by the fact that it is difficult to grasp problems of gender equality in detail, although the European case shows that the amount of knowledge on electoral systems did not per definition lead to changes at that level, which would have been a nice example of gender mainstreaming wo/men’s position in political decision-making. Furthermore, the issue has often not been a feminist one, in the sense that part of the feminist movement refused the institutionalisation of women in what was considered to be patriarchal political structures. In many cases femocrats and the political women’s organisations put forward the issue (Lovenduski et al. forthcoming). The logic of party politics, with its emphasis on the need to conquer positions of power, or of public administration, requesting a more tempered approach, might have influenced the framing. Quantifying the issue can be seen as a strategy to neutralise its aggressive potential for the established power. The emphasis on numbers leaves aside the complexities of the question of women’s position in the broad sense and does not tackle assumptions on which the functioning of society is based.

The strategic framing of women’s position in political decision-making is well-illustrated in the Greek case, which is a good example of the importance of the audience on the framing of the issue. The problem tends to be presented as a democracy issue when the pro-quota speaker addresses an audience that is perceived as non friendly to quotas, such as the Greek Parliament, as a devise to pass legislation through. In other occasions the problem is mainly presented as an equality issue. Due to the male dominated context in which the issue of women’s position in political decision-making must find its way, gender advocates have chosen to frame the issue in the easiest and less aggressive terms, so to be accepted by male policy makers: numbers. This can be a strategy to put the issue on the political agenda, leaving a more radical and feminist framing of the issue for when women have consolidated their positions in the political arena. Moreover, if the framing of wo/men’s position in political decision-making has been mainly elaborated by female party members, this might also have been influenced by their wish to ‘strategically frame’ the issue in a ‘not aggressive’ way so that it could be accepted by their male colleagues. This leads to the emphasis on numbers that easily gets rid of all the complexities of the question and, above all, does not question the male privileged position of power in representative political institutions (in an attempt to be accepted in the typically ‘all men’s club’ of party politics).

The strategic framing of the issue in terms of numbers also works the other way around, protecting politicians against the excuse of letting things drift when it comes to gender relations in political decision-making. Quantifying the issue can be a conscious policy strategy to act while not profoundly wanting to change the status quo. How can we otherwise explain the amount of explanations available while things do not get changed? Finally, and less cynical is the need for politicians to score points quickly and the trend to quantify the policy making process as such. Quotas or target figures are visible measures and rising numbers of women in politics are easily awarded to them, even though reality is more complex. And the quantification of the issue of women’s position in politics also corresponds to the trend to quantify policy-making as such, by monitoring and benchmarking. The reasons for falling into the trap of a benchmarking fallacy are numerous and apparently it happens to both female and male politicians or policy makers.

Conclusions

The aim of this paper consisted in analysing how the issue of gender relations in political decision-making has been dealt with throughout the last decade in a number of EU Member States and at the EU level itself. We wanted to elaborate on the potential relationship between explicitly gendered topics and a gender mainstreaming approach. Referring to Bacchi’s ‘what’s the problem’ approach, we looked at the extent to which the position of wo/men in political decision-making was tackled from a gender mainstreaming perspective, both at the level of problem diagnosis and prognosis. Bacchi’s approach is interesting because it helps focus on what does and what does not get put into question. Women as arrears are the problem and should make the effort to change and adapt to the patriarchal political institutions in the broad sense of the term in order to become part of the game. Men are not a problem and their role should not be questioned. If a gender mainstreaming approach requires a deep change of policy areas, processes, actors, and particularly a look into the interrelated character of gender (i.e. the fact that the role and life style of one gender affects the life opportunities of the other), a focus limited on ‘women as arrears’ does not go in the right direction.

Still, there are some signs of a broader systemic approach to the issue: the reference to patriarchal society, gender roles or electoral systems when searching the causes for women’s under-representation. However, they are general references, with no deep analysis and no impact on the solutions proposed and call for action. There has not been a shift towards such a gender mainstreaming approach in the last decade, even though gender mainstreaming has been promoted and wo/men in political decision-making might be an easy field to apply a gender mainstreaming perspective to. An explanation why this might not have happened is what we call a benchmarking fallacy of policy issues where members of at least one sex are easy to trace and target. In such a case, sex as a social category becomes easy to tackle and complex gender issues can be left aside.
