PDF hosted at the Radboud Repository of the Radboud University Nijmegen

The version of the following full text has not yet been defined or was untraceable and may differ from the publisher's version.

For additional information about this publication click this link.
http://hdl.handle.net/2066/18956

Please be advised that this information was generated on 2018-11-25 and may be subject to change.
What do we know about the legal doctrine of Ibn Šihāb az-Zuhrī, one of the leading scholars in Medina during the first quarter of the second century A.H.? Joseph Schacht wrote about the issue in his epoch-making work The Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence: “Those cases in which Mālik explicitly states that he asked Zuhrī or heard Zuhrī say something can unhesitatingly be regarded as genuine.” Schacht based his conclusion on Mālik’s Muwatta. He continues: “There are other opinions ascribed to Zuhrī which are obviously authentic.” As a source where these opinions are to be found, Schacht mentions the Muwatta again and Saḥnūn’s Mudawwana. Then Schacht states: “But towards the end of the second century A.H., Zuhrī had already been credited with many spurious and often contradictory opinions, and his name inserted in isnāds of traditions which did not yet exist in his time and from which fictitious statements on his supposed doctrine were abstracted.” In Schacht’s opinion, these fictitious transmissions from Zuhrī are to be found for example in Saibānī’s recension of the Muwatta, in Ṣafī’ī’s treatises and in the Mudawwana.

In view of this presentation one would expect Schacht to exclude Mālik’s Muwatta from the suspicion of containing forged Zuhrī traditions. That is not the case, however, as other parts of his Origins make clear. Although referring to “the end of the second century” as the time in which fictitious Zuhrī traditions were circulated, Schacht actually thinks that they were fabricated during the entire second half of the second century and that they are found in all sources of this period, including Mālik’s *Muwattā’. Earlier sources were not available to Schacht. He assumes that only a part of what Mālik in his *Muwattā’, as transmitted by Yaḥyā b. Yaḥyā al-Laiṭī, claims to have received from Zuhrī actually comes from him. As the only evidence of authenticity, Schacht accepts Mālik’s own statement that he asked or heard Zuhrī’s opinion on a subject. Yet these texts are quite rare in Mālik’s Zuhrī transmission. Most consist, instead, of simple sayings and traditions, i.e. texts in which Zuhrī appears only as transmitter. In these cases, Schacht decides the question of whether Zuhrī really was – or at least could have been – Mālik’s source for a text by placing the content of the text in the general context of legal developments as he himself had reconstructed them.

Schacht’s ideas concerning the development of Islamic jurisprudence were deeply affected by his appreciation of the sources. He maintains that, generally, traditions referring to the generation of the so-called Successors (tābi‘ūn) represent the earliest stage in the process of projecting the legal development of the second century back into the first century; Companion (saḥāba) texts are a younger level; and the traditions of the Prophet are the youngest element in this chain. Zuhrī traditions, in which he is only Mālik’s informant for doctrines of earlier authorities (Successors, Companions, the Prophet), cannot be accepted, therefore, as authentic elements of Zuhrī’s legal teaching. “He appears as the common link in the iṣnāds of a number of traditions from the Prophet, from Companions and from Successors; Zuhrī himself was hardly responsible for the greater part of these traditions.”

Schacht regards even Zuhrī texts referring to tābi‘ūn as fictitious, i.e. not really going back to Zuhrī and by no means to the alleged Successor. “This makes it impossible to regard information on the Medinese lawyers in the time of the Successors as genuine, unless it is positively shown to be authentic. It would be rash to exclude this possibility a priori, but as far as I have been able to investigate the development of the Medinese doctrine, I have not found any opinion ascribed to one of these ancient lawyers which is likely to be authentic.”
Until recent times Schacht’s work on the origins of Islamic jurisprudence has deeply affected research into the history of Islamic law. It influenced especially western scholars, but a few Muslim ones as well. Yet Schacht’s assumptions are not as plausible as they appear at first sight. To start with, one can ask: Where does he derive the certainty that, on the one hand, Zuhri’s legal opinions which Mālik reports he asked Zuhri about or heard from him (for example with the formula “\textit{an Ibn Šihāb annahu samī‘tu yaqūl}”, i.e. from Ibn Šihāb, that he heard him say)⁸ are really authentic, whereas, on the other hand, \textit{ra‘y} which Mālik introduces with, for example, “\textit{‘an Ibn Šihāb annahu qāla: samī‘tu ‘Abū Bakr b. ‘Abdarrahmān yaqūl}” (from Ibn Šihāb, that he said: ‘I heard Abū Bakr b. ‘Abdarrahmān say)”⁹ do not derive from Ibn Šihāb and by no means from his authorities? Could a forged legal case not be given the form of question and answer or of a “heard” tradition just as well as the form of a simple saying? Moreover, the method of placing a text in the historical development of legal doctrine by following in the first place the text (\textit{matn}) and taking the \textit{isnād} only secondarily into account depends on certain premisses and subjective considerations which are not necessarily shared by everyone. The results of this method are not always tenable, as I have shown elsewhere.¹⁰

For this reason it is not advisable to follow Schacht’s method of collecting the traditions concerning individual legal topics, then comparing their texts, ordering them chronologically according to criteria of content and, only then, evaluating the transmission lines (\textit{asānīd}) and quality of the collections in which the traditions are found. In the following, the reverse procedure has been chosen. My investigation focuses on the issue of the sources that could be used as a basis for a reconstruction and critical evaluation of Zuhri’s legal doctrines and traditions.

Schacht had only Mālik b. Anas’ (d. 179/795) \textit{Muwatta’} as an early source for Zuhri’s jurisprudence (\textit{fiqh}) at his disposal, preserved in the two recensions by Yaḥyā b. Yaḥyā and Muḥammad aš-Šaibānī. Nowadays we can refer to more early text corpora. I would like to mention only two of them which are particularly important, both because of the large number of Zuhri texts they contain and because of their age, for they originate from before or, at least, the same period as Mālik’s Muwaṭṭa’. I am referring to the transmissions of Maʿmar b. Rāṣid (d. 153/770) and ‘Abdalmalik Ibn Ġuraiğ (d. 150/767) contained in ‘Abdarrazzāq as-Ṣan‘ānī’s Muṣannaf. As I have shown elsewhere in more detail, their transmissions are old and genuine and were originally contained in the written works of these scholars. ‘Abdarrazzāq received their material when studying with the two scholars and later integrated it into his much larger compilation of traditions.11

In biographical literature Maʿmar and Ibn Ġuraiğ are known, like Mālik, as Zuhri’s students. Yet this is no reason for accepting all their transmissions from him as authentic Zuhri material, as Schacht’s evaluation of Mālik’s Zuhri material shows. To answer the question whether Maʿmar’s and Ibn Ġuraiğ’s Zuhri texts are genuine or not, I did not follow Schacht’s method of proceeding from hypotheses about the early development of Islamic jurisprudence which are based on Šāfiʿi’s treatises and information deriving from the second half of the second century A.H. and later. Rather, I have studied, first, the early compilations which contain large numbers of texts attributed to Zuhri with the aim of finding out whether their authors should be regarded as forgers of the material that they present. Only then have their Zuhri traditions been analysed.
Among the three corpora most of the Zuhri texts are to be found in Ma‘mar b. Rāšid’s corpus, which can be reconstructed on the basis of the asānīd, i.e. the transmission chains, in ‘Abdarrazzāq’s Musannaf. When we classify the persons from whom Ma‘mar says he derived legal opinions or traditions according to their frequency, a remarkable picture emerges: Most often, he mentions the Medinan scholar Zuhri (28%), followed by the Baṣran Qatāda (25%). He reports much less from the Baṣran Ayyūb [b. Abī Tamīma] (11%), even less from the Yemenite Ibn Ṭāwūs (5%), the Baṣrans Yaḥyā b. Abī Kaṭīr (3%) and Ḥasan [al-Baṣrī] (3%), the Medinan Hīšām b. ‘Urwa (2%), and the Küfans Ḥammād [b. Abī Sulaimān] (1%) and al-ʿAmās (1%). He reports from more than 75 other people only sporadically (less than 1%). Besides these, a relatively high percentage (7%) of anonymous traditions is to be found, i.e. traditions in which Ma‘mar does not mention his direct informant.

These percentages do not match the assumption that Ma‘mar generally fabricated his transmission data to ascribe his own legal opinions to earlier authorities or to provide traditions circulating anonymously with asānīd. A forger moved by such goals would have proceeded otherwise, either more unsystematically or more systematically, by ascribing all of his texts to only a few important informants instead of to a large number of – partly unknown – people. Anonymous traditions, gaps in the asānīd and, moreover, texts reflecting Ma‘mar’s own ra‘y do not match at all with the picture of a presumed forger. If Ma‘mar really had been a forger of transmission data, one could also ask what induced him to choose a Medinan scholar as one of his main authorities although he generally preferred scholars from Basra. After all, he originated from Baṣra and later moved to Yemen to become a teacher there.

On the basis of these considerations the hypothesis that Ma‘mar forged his traditions appears very unlikely. The percentages of Ma‘mar’s informants can more plausibly be explained by historical circumstances: In his hometown Baṣra he mainly studied with Qatāda, but occasionally also with other scholars, and he continued his studies in Medina, mainly with Zuhrī and sporadically with other Medinan scholars. He may have obtained his materials deriving from other centres of jurisprudence during his trips or his stay in the Ḥijāz hearing pilgrim scholars. The doubts about the forging hypothesis deepen when comparing the text corpora of Maʿmar’s two main informants: Zuhrī and Qatāda.

Two thirds of Maʿmar’s Zuhrī texts reproduce his personal opinion (raʿy) and only one third traditions (ātār, ahādīt), in which Zuhrī only posits as transmitter. In these transmissions four tābiʿūn from Medina prevail: Saʿīd b. al-Musayyab (19%), Sālim b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar and ʿUrwa b. az-Zubair (13% each) and ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUtba (8%). Other known tābiʿūn from Medina like Sulaimān b. Yasār, Abū Salama b. ʿAbdarrāḥmān, al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad and Abū Bakr b. ʿAbdarrāḥmān, or Syrian ones like Qabīṣa b. Ḍuʿaib appear much more rarely. It is remarkable that the material of three of Zuhrī’s four main authorities consists exclusively of traditions transmitted by them from earlier authorities; only the Ibn al-Musayyab texts contain his personal raʿy as well as traditions at approximately the same rate. The predominance of traditions over raʿy in the texts of Zuhrī’s informants is typical in Maʿmar’s material. Even so, asānid are not given regularly. 40% of Zuhrī’s transmissions from other persons lack information on the informants or chains of transmitters. This is not only the case for the saḥāba-traditions, but also for those from the Prophet. Precedents or legal opinions of saḥāba are mentioned twice as frequently as those of the Prophet and three times more frequently than those of tābiʿūn. Among the saḥāba, ʿUmar is the most prominent, followed in frequency at some distance by his son ʿAbdallāh, then by ʿUṭmān, ʿĀʾīṣa, Ibn ʿAbbās and Zaid b. Ṭābit.

Maʿmar’s Qatāda texts consist – like the ones he ascribes to Zuhrī – mainly of Qatāda’s raʿy (62%) and only to a lesser extent of traditions that Qatāda transmits from others. Differently from Zuhrī, they are dominated by only two ābī’ūn: al-Ḥasan al-Brārī (31%) and, at some distance, the Medinan scholar Sa‘īd b. al-Musayyab (20%). Other ābī’ūn like the Kūfans Ibrāhīm an-Nāḥa‘ī and Šuraiḥ or the Basran Abū ș-Ṣa‘tā’ [Gābir b. Zaid] appear rather rarely. Contrary to the comparable Zuhrī traditions, the texts which Qatāda transmits from ābī’ūn usually reproduce their ra‘y; 84% of the texts attributed to Ḥasan al-Brārī consist of his legal opinions and those referring to Ibn al-Musayyab contain no transmissions from other authorities at all in the sample analysed here. In Zuhrī’s Ibn al-Musayyab material, on the contrary, there is – as mentioned above – a balance between ra‘y and traditions.

Notably underdeveloped in comparison to the Zuhrī texts is the use of the isnād in Qatāda’s traditions. In 60% of Zuhrī’s traditions one comes across an isnād or information about an informant; in Qatāda’s traditions such texts amount to only 12%. Ma‘mar’s Qatāda texts also differ from Zuhrī’s in the distribution of the authorities mentioned: the older ābī’ūn dominate at the expense of the saḥāba. Also contrary to Zuhrī’s saḥāba traditions, we find that in Qatāda’s texts ‘Alī and Ibn Mas‘ūd prevail over ‘Umar in frequency of quotations; Ibn ‘Abbās follows at a considerable distance, whereas other Companions are only sporadically mentioned.
Traditions from the Prophet are quite rare in Ma‘mar’s transmission from Qatāda, while Ma‘mar transmits them from Zuhrī five times more frequently. Finally, a difference in the terminology of transmission must be pointed out: Ma‘mar often reproduces Zuhrī’s ra‘y in the form of an answer (responsum) to his own question, for example with the formula: “I asked Zuhrī about ... He said...”.13 This text genre occurs only very rarely in Ma‘mar’s Qatāda material.14

The characteristic differences described above between the text corpora of Ma‘mar’s two most important authorities for legal opinions and traditions render very unlikely the assumption – which could be made on the basis of Schacht’s theories -- that Ma‘mar faked the origin of the texts in order to legitimate his own teachings through a Medinan and a Başrân authority.

There are other indications to support this thesis: Ma‘mar often refers to the fact that Zuhri’s and Qatada’s opinions agree on a legal problem. He usually introduces such a text with the words “‘an az-Zuhri wa-Qatada, qâlal” (from Zuhri and Qatada, both said), or he sometimes puts a note at the end of a Zuhri text, such as “wa-qâlahu Qatada” (so said Qatada [as well]), or “‘an Qatada mitlahu” ([I transmit] the same from Qatada). This means in fact that in those cases where he only quotes the Medinan scholar on a legal issue, Ma‘mar either did not know a relevant statement of Qatada’s, or it appeared to him not worth mentioning, or, maybe, it was so different that it needed a separate text, or the Qatada text was left out by ‘Abdarrazzâq. The same is true in cases where Ma‘mar only presents Qatada’s opinion without mentioning Zuhri’s.

If one wishes to see in Ma‘mar’s method of quotation circumstantial evidence of forgery and if one wishes to claim that Ma‘mar tried in this way to create additional authorities for his own legal opinions, the question remains as to why he had not done it more often. Further evidence against the assumption of forgery is the fact that in some cases Ma‘mar explicitly refers to a difference of opinion between Zuhri and Qatada without clarifying which of the two he prefers. Here are two examples:

‘Abdarrazzâq from Ma‘mar from Zuhri; he said: “When a man buys a divorce from his wife, it is ḥul‘ (ransom divorce).” Qatada said: “It is not ḥul‘.”

‘Abdarrazzâq from Ma‘mar from Zuhri and Qatada; both said: “Her right to divorce (amr-rubâ) is in her hand until she decides [on the offer of divorce].” Qatada said [moreover]: “… Even if her husband has sex with her [aṣābahā], before she decides.”
In the first case we have contradictory opinions, in the second case we just see an extension or concretisation of the opinion ascribed to both Zuhri and Qatāda. In both cases it is not clear which opinion Maʿmar himself favours. Why should Maʿmar have falsely ascribed such cases of diverging opinions to his main authorities, of whom he more often reports agreement? It is even more difficult to defend the forgery thesis in view of texts in which Maʿmar opposes the raʾy of his authority. An example:

‘Abdarrazzāq from Maʿmar from Qatāda about a man, who gave his wife the right to divorce (amr) in her own hands. He [Qatāda] said: “If one of them dies before she has made a decision, neither of them inherits from the other. When he puts the power to divorce her in another man’s hands, and this man to whom the power of divorce has been given dies before deciding anything, he cannot marry her again until she has first married another man. If one of them dies before he [i.e. the one entrusted with the power of divorce] has made a decision, they cannot inherit from another.

Maʿmar said: “I heard somebody say: ‘When the man into whose hands the power to divorce her has been put dies before making a decision, that is nothing [i.e. this should not be considered a divorce].’ I prefer this [opinion] to that of Qatāda’s.”

The circumstantial evidence presented above goes against the idea that Maʿmar forged or invented his information on the origin of his texts. As a consequence, until the contrary is proven, we must consider his Zuhri and Qatāda texts as authentic, i.e. really received from the persons named. The attempt to avoid this consequence by assuming that a part of Maʿmar’s material, e.g. the traditions from earlier authorities, is the work of anonymous forgers – as Schacht argued – is not convincing. These forgers would have been Maʿmar’s contemporaries, i.e. active in the second quarter of the second century A.H., and they must have produced Zuhri and Qatāda traditions in huge numbers. These “workshops of forgers” could not have remained undetected by a long-serving student of Zuhri and Qatāda. There is, however no hint of such “workshops” either in Maʿmar’s or in his pupil ‘Abdarrazzāq’s texts. Moreover, the asānid in Maʿmar’s Zuhri and Qatāda traditions are too fragmentary. We would expect more sophisticated asānīd from professional forgers of this time.

The existence of Ma‘mar’s Zuhrī and Qatāda texts should be interpreted, therefore, as follows: Ma‘mar was for a longer period of time a student of both teachers. The large number of texts and the fact that he occasionally points to tiny differences in his teachers’ opinions certainly presuppose written notes made during or after the lectures as memory aids. The differences between both bodies of transmission reflect different circumstances in which the texts were received. For example, the fact that Ma‘mar rarely transmits Qatāda’s answers to his own questions whereas he frequently does so in the case of Zuhrī may be a result of the fact that Ma‘mar was still very young when studying with Qatāda and was therefore not allowed to ask questions. The situation changed when he later became a student of Zuhrī and was no longer counted as a beginner. Another explanation for the differences may lie in the two legal scholars’ different stages of development and in regional peculiarities in legal teaching in both centres of learning. This could explain, for example, the more frequent use of the isnād in Zuhrī’s traditions or the rarer occurrence of ahādīt from the Prophet in Qatāda’s texts. Interpreted in this way, the texts transmitted by Ma‘mar enable us to get detailed insights into the state of development that legal thinking and teaching had reached in the first quarter second century A.H.

For this reason Ma‘mar’s Zuhrī transmission can be regarded as a useful source for the legal doctrines and traditions of this famous Medinan scholar. This conclusion does not exclude the possibility of Ma‘mar’s having occasionally made mistakes when preserving or transmitting the material received from Zuhrī.

The conclusions drawn up to now are based solely on Ma‘mar’s texts as contained in ‘Abdarrazzāq’s Muṣannaf. I did not refer to biographical traditions about Ma‘mar, as this type of information about Islamic scholars living during the first two centuries A.H. is regarded as generally unreliable by many non-Muslim scholars. However, the preserved biographical traditions about Maʿmar confirm the results obtained through our text analysis to a large extent. Let us have a look at the biographical material.

Maʿmar b. Rāṣid, a maula of the tribe al-Azd, grew up in Baṣra, where he began his studies – as he himself said – in the year when al-Ḥasan al-Baṣri died, i.e. in 110/728-9, when he was 14 years old. It is possible that he still heard him, but that is not confirmed in the biographical sources. Again according to himself, he then studied with Qatāda.26 He left Baṣra, where he had formed a close friendship with Ayyüb b. Abi Tamīma, either shortly before or after Qatāda’s death (117/735) and became a student of Zuhrī. He is indeed considered, along with Mālik b. Anas, as one of Zuhrī’s most important students. He occasionally returned to Baṣra for visits and took the opportunity to study with some of the scholars there. At an unknown date he moved to Ṣanʿā, the centre of learning in Yemen, where he died in 153/770 or 154/771 (less probable alternatives given are 150 or 152) aged 57 or 58, surrounded by his students, among whom was ‘Abdarrazzāq.27

Maʿmar belongs among the first muṣannifūn, i.e. those who ordered their texts thematically. His muṣannaf works do not seem to have been widely dispersed because their existence or their titles are rarely mentioned in the biographical sources. Yet one of his muṣannaf works entitled Kitāb al-Ǧāmiʿ is preserved in the transmission of his disciple ‘Abdarrazzāq, and forms the last “book” of his Muṣannaf.29 Maʿmar’s wider muṣannaf compilation is probably preserved only in the (scattered) form in which ‘Abdarrazzāq integrated it into his own Muṣannaf.

The evaluation of early Islamic scholars by the later Muslim ḥadīt critics and rijāl experts which developed after the second half of the second century is useful for historical research in many respects. Their results must be handled with great care, however, for they are strongly linked to later norms of ḥadīt transmission which were not generally followed by the traditionists of the first half of the second century A.H., to say nothing of the early fuqahā’ who mainly taught their own ra’ī. Nevertheless, it is worth pointing out that Ma’mar’s transmission from Zuhri is considered very reliable by the hadīt critics.

III

Another important early source for Zuhri’s fiqh is the transmission of the Meccan scholar Ibn Ğuraiğ (d. 150/767). Like the one by Ma’mar it is contained in ‘Abdarrazzāq’s Muṣannaf and it can be reconstructed on the basis of the chains of transmission. Since I have already discussed the value of Ibn Ğuraiğ’s transmission elsewhere, I shall limit myself to the essential points which are important for the comparison with other early sources and for the Zuhri texts. The Ibn Ğuraiğ transmission in ‘Abdarrazzāq’s Muṣannaf is qua extension only slightly inferior to Ma’mar’s and contains more than 5000 individual texts.1 As we have already seen, Ma’mar’s corpus is dominated by two authorities, including Zuhri, whereas Ibn Ğuraiğ’s material presents only one main authority, the Meccan faqīh ‘Ātā b. Abī Rabāḥ. Nearly 40% of Ibn Ğuraiğ’s texts are ascribed to him. The rest are ascribed to a large number of informants (more than 100 persons), among whom five names are mentioned more frequently than others: the Meccan ‘Amr b. Dīnār (7%), the Medinan Ibn Ṣihāb (6%), the Yemenite Ibn Tāwūs (5%), the Meccan Abū z-Zubair (4%) and the ‘Irāqi ‘Abdalkarīm [al-Ǧazarī] (3%).

As in the case of ‘Abdarrazzāq’s Ma’mar transmission, I consider the strongly varying attribution of texts to informants which is found in Ibn Ğuraiğ’s corpus, along with the fact that it also contains legal opinions of his own and a conspicuous number of anonymous traditions, as evidence against the forgery theory. By forgery theory I mean the hypothesis that Ibn Ğuraiğ falsely ascribed his own legal opinions and those of other scholars at Mecca and elsewhere, as well as traditions (āṭār and ahādīt) circulating during his lifetime, to the previous generation of scholars. It seems more plausible to explain the peculiar attribution of texts to informants found in Ibn Ġuraiğ’s material by historical circumstances during his lifetime. For example, the fact that he has only one main authority, ‘Aṭā’, may be due to the fact that ‘Aṭā’ was his most important teacher, with whom he studied the longest and from whom he learned the most.

Other arguments against the forgery theory can be found in a comparison of the texts ascribed by Ibn Ġuraiğ to different persons. A comparison between Ibn Ġuraiğ’s transmissions from ‘Aṭā’ b. Abī Rabāḥ and Zuhrī, whom he usually calls Ibn Šihāb, will do as an example.

Let’s first have a look at the peculiarities of Ibn Ġuraiğ’s transmission from ‘Aṭā’. The ‘Aṭā’ texts reproduce for the most part (80%) his ra’y. Only a fifth of them contain traditions from others in which cAtā is only the transmitter. The forms in which Ibn Ġuraiğ presents ‘Aṭā”s ra’y are striking. Beside the usual sayings (dicta) we find an almost similar number of responsa, i.e. answers which ‘Aṭā’ gave to questions asked by Ibn Ġuraiğ himself or, more rarely, by other people, known by name or not. When classifying ‘Aṭā”s atār and ahādīt according to the authorities to which they refer, we get the following result: He quotes the saḥāba most frequently, the Prophet much less, and his contemporaries only sporadically. Furthermore, a large number of quotations from the Qur’ān are notable. Among the Companions it is Ibn ‘Abbās who clearly dominates. ‘Aṭā’ refers to him nearly three times more than to ‘Umar b. al-Ḥaṭṭāb, the second most frequently mentioned Companion, who himself is quoted three times more than ‘Alī or ‘Ā’iša. The Companions Šabīr b. ‘Abdalläh, Abū Huraira, Ibn ‘Umar and others appear only rarely. The ahādīt of the Prophet are clearly outnumbered by ‘Aṭā”s references to Ibn ‘Abbās, but the Prophet follows in second place, ahead of all other saḥāba. ‘Aṭā’ only sporadically gives his informants for the Companion traditions, and among his ahādīt from the Prophet only a quarter have a – partly incomplete – isnād.
In sharp contrast to his transmission from ‘Atā’, in which the latter’s ra’y dominates, Ibn Ġuraiğ’s transmission from Zuhrī consists mostly of traditions in which Zuhrī functions only as transmitter (58%). The texts which contain Zuhrī’s ra’y are fewer, but nevertheless noticeable in number (42%). The ra’y appears, in most cases, in the form of sayings (dicta) and seldom as answers (responsa). In striking contrast to Ibn Ġuraiğ’s responsa transmitted from ‘Atā’, where Ibn Ġuraiğ often asks the questions himself, his responsa transmitted from Zuhrī are only exception­ally of that type. Among Ibn Ġuraiğ’s traditions transmitted from Zuhrī, ‘Urwa b. az-Zubair is the most important informant of Zuhrī. In that function he clearly outdoes other Medinan scholars such as Abū Salama b. ‘Abdarrahmān, Sālim b. ‘Abdallāh b. ‘Umar, ‘Ubaidallāh b. ‘Abdallāh b. ‘Utba, Sulaimān b. Yasār and others.

Most of Zuhrī’s traditions (ātār and aḥādīt) refer to individuals of the Companion generation as authorities. Only half as many of his traditions refer to Successors or the Prophet. Among the Prophet’s Companions ‘Umar is mentioned most frequently, followed by ‘Uṭmān, Ibn ‘Umar and ‘Ā’iša. Zaid b. Ṭābit, Abū Huraira, Ibn ‘Abbās and other, less famous, sahāba occur more rarely. If these authorities are ordered according to frequency, the Prophet is in first place, in sharp contrast to what we find in ‘Atā’’s traditions. After the Prophet the second caliph ‘Umar comes only at some distance. Furthermore, it is remarkable that the caliphs are strongly represented, even the Umayyads like ‘Abdalmalik and ‘Umar b. ‘Abdal‘azīz. About half of Zuhrī’s traditions have an isnād, though not always a complete one; his traditions from the Prophet usually have an isnād.

The comparison of two of Ibn Ġuraiğ’s text corpora, the one transmitted from ‘Atā’ b. Abī Rabāḥ and the one ascribed to Ibn Šihāb (az-Zuhrī), shows that they are very different with regard to volume (i.e. absolute number of texts); importance of ra’y; text genres; use of isnād; authorities preferred etc. Ibn Ġuraiğ can hardly have fabricated both corpora. By fabricated I mean that he himself composed the texts and supplied them arbitrarily with asānid. There is other evidence, which I have presented elsewhere,\textsuperscript{32} that supports the hypothesis that Ibn Ğuraiğ in fact acquired his ‘Atā’ texts from ‘Atā’ himself, for example: Ibn Ğuraiğ’s personal legal opinions; his comments on ‘Atā’’s texts; his conscious deviations from ‘Atā’’s opinions; occasional indirect transmission from ‘Atā’; and the reporting of different solutions of ‘Atā’’s to the same problem. Similar peculiarities can also be recognised in Ibn Ğuraiğ’s transmission from Ibn Šihāb, for example the indirect transmission from him,\textsuperscript{33} or references to contradictory statements.\textsuperscript{34} Finally, it is not easy to understand why the Meccan scholar Ibn Ğuraiğ, who mainly refers to authorities from this town, should have fabricated texts reproducing the ra’y and traditions of a Medinan faqîh and transmitter.

All this lends support to the hypothesis that the texts which Ibn Ğuraiğ reproduces really come from the persons indicated in the isnād. Alternatively we would have to imagine that Ibn Ğuraiğ received his material from anonymous forgers rather than from of the persons he names. Yet such an assumption means the problem would only be shifted to the realm of speculations which cannot be checked. It cannot be accepted as a scientifically permissible explanation for the differences between the two corpora.

To explain their respective peculiarities, we should consider, instead, different conditions as to how Ibn Ğuraiğ received his material, and different individual and/or regional peculiarities of ‘Atā’’s and Zuhri’s legal scholarship. The large number of responsa in Ibn Ğuraiğ’s transmission from ‘Atā’ may mirror the manner in which Ibn Ğuraiğ acquired his legal knowledge from this teacher. The predominance of ra’y, the high frequency of texts from Ibn ‘Abbās and the rare occurrence of asānid may be typical of ‘Atā’’s doctrine and/or that of the Meccan fiqh in general at the beginning of the second century A.H. On the contrary, the rare occurrence of direct questions put by Ibn Ğuraiğ to Ibn Šihāb and the only sporadic references to a ṣamā’ (hearing) from him may be circumstantial evidence that Ibn Guraiğ was not one of Zuhri’s regular students. He may have acquired a part of his Zuhri texts not by hearing, but by copying a written source which Zuhri or one of his pupils put at Ibn Guraiğ’s disposal. In Ibn Guraiğ’s Zuhri material, the predominance of traditions over his ra’î, the higher frequency of informants given for traditions, and the eminent role played by the Prophet as a legal authority may be typical of Zuhri’s and/or Medinan jurisprudence in this period. Such a historical explanation does not lack plausibility – to my mind – and offers the advantage that it is falsifiable. For this reason we should maintain, until the contrary is proven, that the texts which Ibn Guraiğ ascribes to Ibn Şihâb [az-Zuhri] do really derive from the latter.

This conclusion and our assumptions as to how Ibn Guraiğ could have come by his texts are based so far exclusively on ‘Abdarrazzâq’s texts as preserved in his Musannaf. I have left aside biographical information about Ibn Guraiğ for the reasons already mentioned above. This will be remedied now.35

‘Abdalmalik b. ‘Abdal’aziz b. Guraiğ, a maülâ of the Umayyad clan Al Ḥālid
b. Asid, was born in the year 80/699, probably in Mecca, where he grew up. He started studying when he was 15 under the patronage of ‘Atâ’ b. Abî Rabâh, the leading Meccan scholar of that time. He frequented his study circle for about 18 years but he separated from his teacher one or two years before his death in 115/773 to join the younger scholar ‘Amr b. Dinâr whose lessons he attended for about seven years. This information corresponds to the picture we found when investigating the frequency of transmitters in Ibn Guraiğ’s corpus: ‘Atâ’ is by far the most frequently quoted, followed by ‘Amr b. Dinâr.36 In this period Ibn Guraiğ probably also studied with other scholars, for example, the Meccan Ibn Abî Mulaika (d. 117/735 or 118/736) and the Medinan scholar Nâfi’ (d. 118/736 or 119/737), the maülâ of Ibn ‘Umar, who stayed at Mecca from time to time. All this information, transmitted by Ibn Guraiğ’s students, is usually based on his own statements. He died in 150/767.
Ibn Guraig is one of the first authors – if not the first – of books of traditions compiled in the muṣannaf style, i.e. ordered according to legal topics. His book was probably entitled “Kitāb as-Sunan”. Most of it must have been comprised of what his pupil ‘Abdarrazzāq transmitted from him in his Muṣannaf. His work had already become famous beyond Mecca during his lifetime and it probably gave an impulse to other scholars, such as Ma’mar b. Rāṣid, Sufyān at-Taurī and Mālik b. Anas, to compose similar works.

In biographical literature, Ibn Guraig is considered an excellent faqīh, Qur’ān reciter and exegete. His disciples composed a “Kitāb at-Tafsīr” from his Qur’ān lessons. Yet the judgment of the ḥadīt critics on him was controversial. Some younger contemporaries like Mālik or Ibn Guraig’s pupil Yahyā b. Sa’īd al-Qaṭṭān already showed reservations concerning some parts of his transmission. His transmissions from ‘Atā’ b. Abī Rabāḥ, ‘Amr b. Dīnār, Ibn Abī Mulaika, Nāfi’ and some others, however, are usually excluded from the critics’ negative assessment. Criticism is directed mainly against certain forms of transmission used by Ibn Guraig which from the middle of the second century A.H. onwards came to be seen as inadequate. Criticism is also directed against the fact that he did not always make these forms of transmission clear in his transmission terminology. For example, Ibn Guraig used an informant’s written material which the latter had left to him or which Ibn Guraig had copied himself and which he had obtained permission to transmit, but which he had not personally “heard” or read out to the informant. In some cases, the manuscript Ibn Guraig had copied may have been only a collection of texts belonging to one of the informant’s students. This was a method of transmission widely use during the first half of the second century A.H. and not yet generally scorned. In this way, for example, Ibn Guraig obtained his abādīt transmitted from Zuhrí, as he himself is reported to have admitted. This corresponds to the results we obtained when analysing Ibn Guraig’s Zuhrí texts. In sharp contrast to his ‘Atā’ transmission, we found in the corpus of Zuhrí texts hardly any responsa to Ibn
'Abdarrazzaq from Ibn Ğuraiğ; he said: Ibn Șihāb transmitted to me, [when] I asked him about a man who divorced his wife three times while he was suffering pains (fi waga') [i.e. during an illness]: ‘How is it? Must she observe her waiting period when he dies, and does she inherit from him?’ He (Ibn Șihāb) said: ‘Utmān decided about a wife of 'Abdarrahmān [b. 'Auf], that she had to observe her waiting period and that she inherits from him. He let her inherit from him after she had concluded her waiting period. ‘Abdarrahmān had suffered pains for a long time.42

Texts such as this one show that one cannot generalise about the biographical reports about how Ibn Ğuraiğ received Zuhrī’s ahādīt. Indeed it is also mentioned in biographical literature that Ibn Ğuraiğ had personal contacts with Zuhrī. He was not one of his regular students, however. This latter fact does not exclude the possibility that he “heard” from him occasionally or asked him questions, maybe during one of Zuhrī’s stays in Mecca for the ḥagg. This explains the occasional responsa to Ibn Ğuraiğ’s answers. It would be unwarranted to regard Ibn Ğuraiğ as unreliable or as a forger only because of a a few cases of contradiction between the information he is giving about his mode of transmission and the biographical information preserved about him. A historian need not necessarily share the hadīt critics’ reservations regarding Ibn Ğuraiğ’s Zuhrī transmission. Even if Ibn Ğuraiğ received most of Zuhrī’s “ahādīt” – that term does not necessarily include his ra’y – in written form, that is, without hearing them from him or reading them out to him, it does not mean that they should be considered as false or unreliable for that reason, but only that these sources do not meet the high standards of the later Muslim hadīt criticism. If the historian were only permitted to use sources which met these criteria, most of the sources on which historians of Islam rely would be unusable.

Our investigation of the evidence concerning Ibn Ğuraiğ which can be found in biographical literature leads, on the whole, to a picture very similar to the one that we could outline on the basis of his texts. This could lead to the supposition that the biographical traditions could have been extrapolated from the texts. However, there is hardly any evidence for such a claim. Only the later voluminous lists of teachers and pupils as we find them, for example, in Ibn Ḥaḡar’s Taḥdib, probably arose, at least partially, in that way. Thus, on the basis not only of Ibn Ḥuraiq’s texts but also of the biographical information on him, which goes back for the most part to his students, we are justified in considering his Zuhrī transmission as authentic, in the sense that he in fact received the texts from Zuhrī.

IV

The smallest but no less important of the three early corpora of transmissions from Zuhrī is that of Mālik b. Anas in his Muwaṭṭa’. The Muwaṭṭa’ is basically a muṣān-naf work similar to those by Maʿmar and Ibn Ḥuraiq, but more fully amplified with annotations. If analysed according to the alleged origin of its transmissions, the following picture emerges: Mālik refers most frequently to Ibn Sihāb [az-Zuhri] (21 %), who, for this reason, can be considered his main informant. Texts from Nāfi’, the maula of Ibn ʿUmar, and from Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd al-Anṣārī follow at some distance (14 % each). Rabīʿa b. Abī ‘Abdarrahmān, ‘Abdarrahmān b. al-Qāsim, Hišām b. ʿUrwa, and ‘Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr are among the informants mentioned less frequently (4 – 2 %). They are all Medinan scholars. A large number of names appear only sporadically. In Mālik’s Muwaṭṭa’, the stock of anonymous traditions is much more substantial (18 %) than in the text corpora of Maʿmar and Ibn Ḥuraiq.45

Faithful to the method I have followed so far, I take this striking distribution of texts among Mālik’s informants as the first circumstantial evidence against the possible suspicion that Mālik forged his transmission. If he had wanted to hide or fake the real origin of his traditions and ascribe them to particularly important authorities instead, the question arises why he chose to do so in such an irregular distribution. Why does he not prefer the older Nāfi’ as his main authority instead of Zuhri? Why does he only quote Nāfi‘ as often as Yahyā b. Sa‘īd, who is a generation younger? And, finally, why does Mālik fail to name informants for so many traditions?

A comparison of the texts which Mālik ascribes to his most important informants supplies further evidence in favour of my hypothesis. I shall limit myself to a comparison of the transmissions from Ibn Śihāb and Nāfi‘: The texts referring to Ibn Śihāb consist for the most part of traditions in which Ibn Śihāb is only a transmitter and Mālik’s informant for the legal opinions of earlier authorities (63%). The remaining part (37%) which contains Zuhri’s own opinions (ra‘y) is nevertheless considerable. Only little more than half of the ra‘y transmissions take the form of responsa to Mālik’s questions or point to a personal communication (sama‘). Is the rest transmitted indirectly? Frequently Zuhri’s ra‘y is introduced in the Muwatta in such a way as to suggest, indeed, an indirect transmission, i.e. by the mediation of an anonymous third person. For example:

[Yahyā b. Yahyā] transmitted to me from Mālik that he had been told (balagahu) that Sa‘īd b. al-Musayyab, Sulaimān b. Yasa‘r and Ibn Śihāb used to say: ...46

This occurs, however, only in collective quotations in which other earlier authorities are mentioned besides Zuhri. Such anonymous references by Mālik to the ra‘y of late first century A.H. Medinan tābi‘ūn are to be found in Yahyā b. Yahyā’s recension of the Muwatta in large numbers. They take the following form:

[Yahyā b. Yahyā] transmitted to me from Mālik that he had been told (balagahu) that al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad...47

Anonymous traditions like this one are usually not found transmitted from Ibn Śihāb alone in the Muwatta. So we have to conclude that the anonymous reference to Ibn Śihāb in collective quotations is an inexact, because shortened, form of quotation which actually should run as follows:
[Yahyā b. Yahyā] transmitted to me from Mālik from Ibn Śihāb, and that he had been told (balağahu) about [the Successors] X and Y that they used to say: ...

This more elaborate but more precise form of collective quotation occurs only occasionally. Mālik’s anonymous indirect reference to Ibn Śihāb in collective quotations should not be considered, therefore, as a real indirect transmission. Such examples do not prove at all that Mālik derives the major part of Ibn Śihāb az-Zuhrī’s ra’y from sources which he passes over in silence. Real indirect transmissions from Zuhrī are to be found in Mālik’s Muwatta’ only rarely. In them Mālik refers to Zuhrī through a third person called by name. Even if such indirect transmissions are quite unusual, their sheer existence shows that we can hardly impute to Mālik the ambition to relate directly all Zuhrī texts known to him, even those which he had not heard from Zuhrī himself, suppressing the names of the informants from whom he actually received the Zuhrī texts.

The ṣāḥīḥ and ḥadīṣs of Mālik’s Zuhrī transmission mostly refer to the ṣaḥāba generation; only half as many go back to the Prophet and the smallest number go back to the tābi‘ūn. Anyway, the Prophet is the most frequently mentioned among all single authorities; he occurs twice as often as ‘Umar or ‘Uthmān, Ibn Śihāb’s favourites among the Companions of the Prophet. Among the ṣaḥāba traditions, those with an isnād prevail over those without; among the traditions from the Prophet both types of transmission are even frequent, whereas the Successor traditions are for the most part anonymous, i.e. lack any isnād.

These findings generate several questions for the advocates of the forgery theory: Why does Mālik, who via Ibn Śihāb mostly refers to the ṣaḥāba or to the Prophet, appeal to Ibn Śihāb’s ra’y at all, if he wanted to base his own fiqh fictitiously on earlier and more eminent authorities? Does it make sense to assume that Mālik invented Prophetic traditions with incomplete aṣānīd, lacking one or even two transmitters, as well as traditions with complete chains of transmitters?

Mālik’s Nāfi’ transmission is totally different from his Ibn Śihāb az-Zuhrī texts. It generally does not contain traditions about Nāfi’ s ra’ y,⁵⁰ but consists almost entirely of traditions which Nāfi’ transmits from other people. About two thirds of them relate to the ra’ y or the legally relevant behaviour of ‘Abdallāh b. ‘Umar who is counted among the saḥāba. The rest refer to the Prophet, his wives, or to a Companion like Zaid b. Ṭābit, often in connection with a member of ‘Umar’s or Ibn ‘Umar’s family. Nāfi’ s informant is for the most part his patron Ibn ‘Umar, more rarely the latter’s wife Ṣāfiyya bint Abī ‘Ubaid, his son Sālim or other family members. Generally, we find informants given in this material for traditions from the Prophet and Companions other than Ibn ‘Umar. There are hardly any responsa by Nāfi’ to questions asked by Mālik himself ⁵¹ or indications that he heard him personally (samā’).

As in the case of Ma’mar and Ibn Ğuraiğ, it is possible to explain – hypothetically – the astonishing differences between Mālik’s Ibn Śihāb [az-Zuhrī] and Nāfi’ transmissions by historical circumstances. For example: The fact that Mālik frequently transmits from Zuhrī responsa to his own questions as well as texts which Mālik explicitly says he heard from Zuhrī, whereas he hardly transmits any of these types of texts from Nāfi’, may be the result of different forms of teaching. Nāfi’ may have had his pupils only copy texts and read them out – or Mālik may have only attended such lessons – whereas Zuhrī may have held additional question times or discussions about legal topics. The finding that Mālik reports from Zuhrī many instances of his ra’ y, and, by comparison, almost none from Nāfi’, may have similar reasons or – more likely – it may mirror the fact that Nāfi’ did not teach his own ra’ y at all, but confined himself in his classes to the transmission and diffusion of traditions only.
The difference between Mālik’s transmissions from Ibn Šihāb and Näfi‘ was noticed by Schacht as well. Yet he did not see in this difference any evidence of a possible authenticity of both text transmissions. On the contrary, he tried to solve the problem by postulating that one or more forgers had invented these texts and falsely ascribed them to both scholars (Nāfi‘ and Zuhri) during the first half of the second century. According to Schacht, Mālik adopted these fabricated texts – those connected with Nāfi’s name possibly from a manuscript – in good faith, thinking that they were genuine, but did not indicate that his transmission was indirect.\(^{52}\) Schacht implies with this assumption that Mālik acted against the rules of the later science of ḥadīt and practised a method of transmission for which, according to biographical information, Mālik fiercely criticised others, for example Ibn Ğuraiğ.\(^{53}\)

Schacht gives several reasons for his aversion to the isnād “Mālik – Nāfi‘ – Ibn ‘Umar”, considered by Muslims as particularly trustworthy:\(^{54}\) Firstly, the quantity of Mālik’s Nāfi‘ traditions is too large for the marked difference in age between them – Nāfi‘ died in 117, Mālik in 179 A.H.\(^{55}\) Secondly, the isnād “Nāfi‘ an Ibn ‘Umar” is what he calls a “family isnād”, which must be generally suspected of having been fabricated. Thirdly, the traditions provided with this isnād reflect, in Schacht’s opinion, a secondary stage in legal development; he writes: “Many Nāfi‘ traditions represent unsuccessful attempts at influencing the doctrine of the Medinese school.” “…These traditions are later than the established Medinese doctrine.”\(^{56}\)

These arguments are not convincing, however. First, according to biographical reports, Mālik was 23 or 24 years old when Nāfi‘ died.\(^{57}\) This is certainly not an age that precludes the taking over of his Nāfi‘ tradition, which is not particularly large, by copying or reading it out. Secondly, it is not plausible that transmission from relatives and family members should be considered a priori as untrustworthy. On the contrary, we can imagine that they are especially reliable because of the longer and more intimate contact that had existed between the transmitter and his informant.\(^{58}\) Thirdly, Schacht’s last argument is part of a circular reasoning; he uses hypotheses on the doctrine of a presumed old "Medinese school" which he himself constructed on the basis of conjectures which already contained his prejudices concerning the value of the asanīd of the second century. Finally, we can question why Mālik should have faked a direct transmission from Nāfi', though he does not shrink from quoting him occasionally via a third person, for example, Nāfi'’s son Abū Bakr.59

Our comparison of the text corpora of Mālik’s most important informants leads to the conclusion that we must assume that Mālik’s transmissions from both Nāfi’ and Zuhrī really derive from them, until the contrary is proven.

This conclusion, based only on Mālik’s Muwatta’, remains tenable even when we look at the biographical reports preserved about Mālik. Schacht has dealt with Mālik’s biography in detail.60 He thinks that we hardly have any reliable information about the period of Mālik’s studies. Schacht only accepts the report that Mālik studied fiqh with Rabi’a b. Farrūḥ, though this information is only found in later sources. He seems to reject as untrustworthy other reports, even early ones, concerning other teachers of Mālik. Schacht emphasises that the fact of Mālik’s transmitting from Nāfi’ and Zuhrī is not proof that he studied with the authorities in question.61

Schacht is surely right in being suspicious of the steady increase in teachers’ and pupils’ names in the biographical sources because they probably are based, at least partially, on the asanīd known to their authors. Yet the reports about Mālik that go back to his immediate pupils cannot be rejected indiscriminately, as Schacht did. In doing so, he was guided by his prejudices concerning the state of development which Islamic fiqh had reached in the first quarter of the second century and he concluded from the content of the texts that they could not derive from the generation of Mālik’s supposed teachers. Some of the gaps in Schacht’s portrayal of Mālik’s biography will be filled in the following paragraph.

24
According to Mālik himself, as transmitted by his student Yaḥyā b. Bukair, he was born in 93/712. This date is preferable to all other dates for which no sources are given. That means that he was 23 or 24 when Nāfi’ died. The ‘Irāqī scholar Šu‘ba [b. al-Ḥaḡgāḡ], a slightly older contemporary of Mālik’s, even reported that Mālik already had his own circle (ḥalqa) of students when he, Šu‘ba, came to Medina a year after Nāfi’’s death. Mālik’s students, like Yaḥyā b. Sa‘īd al-Qaṭṭān, regarded their teacher as one of Nāfi’’s most important “transmitters” – and by this they mean pupils. Critical hadīt scholars, like ‘Alī b. al-Madīnī, Yaḥyā b. Ma‘īn and Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, belonging to the generation of the pupils of Mālik’s students, considered Mālik a student (ṣāḥib) of both Nāfi’ and Zuhrī and the latter, i.e. Zuhrī, as his most important teacher. They probably obtained their information from their teachers, i.e. Mālik’s students, even in the cases when they do not say that explicitly. Among Zuhrī’s pupils they preferred Mālik to all others, mentioning besides him as important students his older contemporary Ma‘mar b. Rāṣid and – with reservations – the slightly younger Ibn ‘Uyaina. The latter reported that Mālik and Ma‘mar took over their material from Zuhrī by copying manuscripts and reading them out (ʿardān), whereas he himself only took over material by listening (sama‘), possibly because he was, due to his age, only a novice in Zuhrī’s circle.

The correspondence between early biographical traditions about Mālik and the results we obtained by investigating the Mālik’s transmission from his teachers as contained in the Muwatta’ corroborates my assumption that Mālik’s Zuhrī traditions in the Muwatta’ are genuine, i.e. their content really does go back to Zuhrī. They deserve our trust until the contrary is proven, not the opposite, as Schacht demanded.
As we have shown, the investigation of the three earliest corpora containing large numbers of Zuhri texts gives rise to the conclusion that the Zuhri transmission of all of them cannot be considered as fabrications of the compilators of these corpora, i.e. texts falsely ascribed to Zuhri. This does not exclude the possibility that they may contain errors which crept in during the process of transmission. If it is true that Ma‘mar’s and Ibn Ğuraiğ’s transmissions found in ‘Abdarrazzäq’s Muṣannaf and Mālik’s transmission in the Muwatta’ independently go back to Zuhri, then we could expect that these three transmission stocks contain, at least partially, similar materials. Whether this is the case will be examined now.

To start with, we have to record that, on the face of it, there are similarities and differences between the three transmission corpora. For example, Ma‘mar’s contains many more texts than the other two, yet this does not necessarily mean that its additional material is fabricated. To explain the difference, we can imagine that, for some reason, Mālik and Ibn Ğuraiğ did not communicate everything they knew from Zuhri and/or that they had learned less from him than Ma‘mar had, maybe because they did not study with Zuhri as long as Ma‘mar did. The fact that in Ma‘mar’s corpus Zuhri’s ra’y predominates, whereas in Ibn Ğuraiğ’s and Mālik’s corpora his traditions from earlier authorities are more frequent, may have similar causes or may mirror Ma‘mar’s stronger interest in Zuhri’s ra’y. Likewise, we can explain the different distribution of Zuhri’s informants in the traditions of the three text corpora. The fact, for example, that Ibn al-Musayyab and Sālim b. ‘Abdal-lāh b. ‘Umar are more frequently mentioned in Ma‘mar’s Zuhri traditions than in those of the other two can, perhaps, be explained by the observation that Ibn Ğuraiğ transmits many Ibn al-Musayyab traditions from other informants, like Yahyā b. Sa‘īd, and many Ibn ‘Umar traditions from Nāfi‘ and Mūsā b. ‘Uqba (*an Nāfi‘). He may have been less interested in Zuhri’s transmission from them. Something similar is true in Mālik’s case. In addition, it is important to bear in mind that Mālik often does not mention his informants for the traditions from the Successors, though, in many cases, Zuhrī probably is Mālik’s source for them.

A comparative analysis the texts (mutūn) contained in the three corpora will offer more substantiated conclusions. For the sake of clarity, I distinguish between Zuhrī’s ra’y and his traditions. The question I will answer first is: How similar are the texts reproducing Zuhrī’s ra’y contained in the tree copora?

If the Zuhrī transmission by Ibn Ğuraiq is compared to the one by Ma’mar from this point of view, the result is that more than half of all ra’y texts transmitted by Ibn Ğuraiq have a parallel in Ma’mar’s corpus. Most of them have the same content, i.e. differ only in the choice of words or in the fullness of the text; some texts are completely identical; others deal with a somewhat diverging point of the same legal issue; obvious contradictions are only rarely found. Here are some examples:

In his Muṣannaf ‘Abdarrazzāq often reproduces sayings (dicta) of Zuhrī which are transmitted by both Ma’mar and Ibn Ğuraiq in the same or very similar words by quoting only one text in full, as a rule that of Ma’mar, and giving from the other one only the isnād, for example “‘an Ibn Ğuraiq ‘an Ibn Śihāb” together with the remark “mitlabu” (the same).65

Examples of texts with the same content but different wording are:

a) ‘Abdarrazzāq from Ma’mar from Zuhrī: There is no objection marrying a free [woman] in addition to a slave woman, [but] it is not permitted to marry a slave woman in addition to a free [wife]. If [a man], married already to a free woman, marries a slave woman, he must be separated (furriqa) from the slave woman and he is to be punished. If he marries a free woman in addition to a slave woman while she knows that he is [already] married to a slave woman, she has the right to the same number (qisma) [of nights] and maintenance. [But] if she married [him] without knowing that he is married to a slave woman, she has the right to decide: If she wants, she can separate from him or stay with him.66

b) 'Abdarrazzâq from Ibn Ğuraïğ; he said: Ibn Šihâb transmitted to me about the free woman who is married [by a man] in addition to a slave woman: The sunna concerning the [woman] with whom a free man does that [i.e. marries her] is that the free man is not permitted to marry a slave woman if he finds the financial means (tul) to [marry] a free woman.67 If he does not find the financial means, marriage with a slave woman is allowed. If he then marries a free woman in addition to her [the slave woman], he can do that provided that the free woman knows that he is [already] married to a slave woman. If she did not know, the free woman can choose between separation from him and staying with him for the same number (qisma) [of nights] and maintenance. [However,] if he marries a slave woman in addition to her [the free woman], she [the slave woman] will be taken away from him, and he will be punished.68

Differences such as the large number of texts tallying only in content but not in wording show that the texts did not result from copying of manuscripts but from notes made during and/or after the lessons. Such a procedure appears to have been quite normal for the type of legal teaching in which questions were asked and legal problems were discussed (as opposed to hadït instruction where texts were recited or read out). The fact that occasionally a different point of a legal issue is emphasised may reflect different personal interests and individual students' different background knowledge. Furthermore, we have to take into account that our three transmitters of Zuhri's legal opinions (Ma'mar, Ibn Ğuraïğ and Mâlik) probably did not study with him at the same time so that their different presentations of the material may be due to Zuhri himself who, perhaps, did not always express his doctrines in exactly the same words.

The rare parallel texts in which obvious contradictions appear are not easily explained. An example:
a) 'Abdarrazzaq from Ma'mar from Zuhri about the one who gratifies his sexual desires with an animal (ya'ti al-bahimata). He said: “He must be flogged 100 times; it does not matter whether he is muḥṣin (ahsana, i.e. has been married before) or not.”

b) 'Abdarrazzaq said: Ibn Ėuraig transmitted to us; he said: Ibn Sīhāb told about a man who cohabitates with a gregarious animal (yaqa'u 'alā l-bahimati min al-an'am) the following: “I have not heard a sunna about it, but we consider him like the one who has illegitimate sexual intercourse [with a human being] (az-zānī); it does not matter whether he is muḥṣin (ahsana) or not.”

In the last text the punishment is not mentioned expressly, but we can infer it, for only the zānī who is not muḥṣin is flogged while the muḥṣin is stoned. Obviously, there is a contradiction between both texts. It is not easy to tell how this came about. We can imagine a change of mind on Zuhri’s part, which would not be at all unusual, or a misunderstanding by one of the pupils who transmitted the text.

When Mālik’s quotations of Zuhri’s ra'y found in the Muwatta' are compared with Ma'mar's and Ibn Ėuraig’s ra'y transmissions from Zuhri contained in the Musannaf, the correspondences are even higher (80%) than between Ma'mar and Ibn Ėuraig. Here, too, completely identical texts are rather unusual; the majority only have the same content; and we occasionally find contradictions as well. The causes of the sometimes smaller, sometimes bigger differences are probably the same as mentioned above.

An example of identical and similar texts:

a) [Yahyā] transmitted to me from Mālik from Ibn Śihāb that he said: “Every divorced woman has the right to an allowance (mut'a).”

b) ['Abdarrazzaq from] Ma'mar from Zuhri; he said: “Every divorced woman has the right to an allowance (mut'a).”
c) ‘Abdarrazzāq from Ibn Ġuraiği from Ibn Šihāb; he said: “The allowance is the same for the woman who had marital intercourse and for the one who had not.” He said [moreover]: “They both have the right to allowance.”

An example of contradictory texts:

a) Yahyā transmitted to me from Mālik, that he asked Ibn Šihāb about the oath [of sexual abstinence] (īlā') of a slave [concerning his wife]. He [Ibn Šihāb] said: “It is like the īlā' of the free man; it is binding, [but] the īlā' of the slave [covers only] two months.”

b) ‘Abdarrazzāq from Ma'mar from Zuhrí; he said: “The slave’s oath [of sexual abstinence] to a slave woman [covers] four months.”

The facts that such contradictions are an exception and that the majority of the Zuhrí dicta expressing his ra'īy correspond in content corroborate my conclusion that all three source corpora contain genuine traditions of Zuhrí’s ra'īy. It is very unlikely that the three compilators – one living in Ṣan‘ā’, another in Mecca and the third in Medina – independently of one another can have ascribed arbitrarily so many similar texts to Zuhrí. In this case of forgery contradictions would occur more frequently. Another possible assumption, namely that all three scholars actually obtained their material from the same “counterfeit workshop” or fell victim to a wandering “pious swindler” who circulated fabricated Zuhrí doctrines, and that they then concealed the source of their material by suppressing the names of their informants in the asānīd, is unconvincing as well. Schacht assumed this for a part of Mālik’s Zuhrí transmission, though he did not suspect Mālik of pia fraus expressly. The practical difficulties of this hypothesis apart, in such a case we could expect more correspondence in wording between the texts of the transmitters.

Perhaps, Schacht would have gone so far as to recognise as genuine the complete ra'īy of Zuhrí as transmitted by Mālik, but in the case of his Zuhrí traditions from earlier authorities no compromise was possible for Schacht, for this would have contradicted his ideas about the development of Islamic jurisprudence. What can be said about Zuhri’s atār and ḥadīt in our three early sources? An extensive comparison of the numerous texts would be desirable but cannot be done in the framework of this essay. Such a comparison should consist of a synopsis of the traditions corresponding in content; it should underline the differences and suggest explanations for them. However, a few results of such an investigation will at least be presented and illustrated with examples.

Taking Mālik’s Muwattā’ as a starting point we can detect that for the majority (85%) of his texts in which Ibn Šihāb functions as transmitter for earlier authorities there are parallel texts in the corpora of Ma‘mar and/or Ibn Ğuraiğ. A minority of texts is transmitted only by the latter two or by one of the three scholars alone. The correspondence varies from identical texts to only a vague resemblance in content. I cannot detect any difference in variation concerning certain types of traditions such as those referring to the tābi‘īn generation, the sahibha or the Prophet. From the point of view of literary genres, short legal maxims are found beside elaborated cases and detailed narratives (qiṣas).

These facts provide evidence against the suspicion, held by Schacht and others, that the traditions labelled as Zuhri transmissions in the ḥadīt compilations emerged only after his death, and that they were falsely ascribed to him and happened to reach the authors of our three compilations by oral transmission – oral because of the many differences between the texts. Firstly, the body of Zuhri traditions is too large to fit this theory. Secondly, the period of time between Zuhri’s death (124/742) and the “publication” of our three authors’ compilations is too short. They probably composed their works some time before their deaths. Ibn Ğuraiğ was already dead by 150/767 and Ma‘mar died in 153/770. Mālik’s Muwattā’ must have existed around 150 at the latest because Šaibānī, who was born in 132/750,80 probably received his version of the Muwattā’ as a young student of Mālik’s – according to biographical reports at the age of 20.81 The year 150 can be considered, therefore, as the terminus ante quem of the existence of all three compilations; but most probably they had already been compiled much earlier. If this is accepted, it remains difficult to explain how the three authors, who lived far away from one another, came into possession of this huge number of texts, which are similar in content but often vary in wording, if one assumes at the same time that the texts were forged by others. Finally, it seems a very odd coincidence that each of the three compilers suppressed their real informant(s) or their common source(s) as if they had agreed to this fraud.

In the following I shall present an example to show the differences between the Zuhri traditions in our three corpora and to clarify the conclusions reached so far.

a) [Yahyä] transmitted to me from Mälik from Ibn Šihäb from Sa‘îd b. al-Musayyab and Sulaimän b. Yasår, that Tulaiha as Asadiyya was married (käna tahta) to Rusäid at-Taqafti. He divorced her and she remarried in her waiting period. 'Umar b. al-Ḥattäb had her and her husband flogged (daraba) with an oxen scourge (mihfaqa) and he sentenced them to be separated (farrqa bainahumä). Then, 'Umar b. al-Ḥattäb said: “If a woman (ayyuma mra’atin) marries during her waiting period and if the man who married her has not consummated the marriage (daḥala biḥā) [yet], both must be separated (furriqa bainahuma); she must [first] observe the remaining part (baqiyya) of her waiting period of [the marriage with] her first husband and then the second man can marry her again (käna hatiban min al-huṭṭāb). [However,] if he has consummated the marriage with her, both must be separated; she must observe [first] what remains of the waiting period of [the marriage with] her first husband, than the waiting period of the second one, and then both are forbidden to marry another again for ever (lät yaqtami‘ān).”

Mälik said: Ibn al-Musayyab said: “She [the woman in the last case] is entitled to her bride wealth [as a compensation] for what was permitted to him from her.”

In the notes, the differences found in Šaibäni’s Muwaṭṭa’ recension are given. These differences consist of additions, varying names, and variations in the text that sometimes look like specifications and sometimes like errors. The omission or suppression of the words “qāla Mālik” before the Ibn al-Musayyab dictum, added at the end of the text, means that it is to be understood as a constituent part of Ibn Śīhāb’s transmission. Originally this additional remark to the tradition from ‘Umar was probably anonymous, like so many of Mālik’s references to Ibn al-Musayyāb found in Yaḥyā’s Muwatta’ version. All in all, the correspondence between both variants of Mālik’s text is so close that it must have been recorded in writing. Let us have a look at the parallels:

b) ‘Abdarrazzāq from Ma’mar from Zuhri from Ibn al-Musayyab, that Ṭulaiḥa bint ‘Aubādallāh married (nakahat) Rusāid at-Taqafi in her waiting period. ‘Umar had them flogged (žalada) with a whip (dirra). He decided (qada): “If a man (ayyumu rağulun) marries a woman during her waiting period and consummates the marriage with her (aṣṭabahd), both must be separated (yufarrāq bainahumā); then, both are forbidden to marry another again (yaqtamāni); she must complete (tastakmilu) what remains (baqiyyatu) of the waiting period [of the marriage with] the first [husband] and then turn (tastaqbilu) to her waiting period of [the marriage with] the second one. [However,] if he has not [yet] consummated the marriage with her (lam yusibha), both must be separated (yufarrāq bainahumā) until she has completed (tastakmilu) what remains of the waiting period of [the marriage with] the first [husband]; then, he [the second one] can marry her again (yahṭubuhu ma’a l-hutṭāb).”

Zuhri said: “I do not know how many [lashes] that flogging amounted to.” He said [moreover]: “‘Aabdalmalik had both of them flogged with 40 lashes in that [i.e. such a case]. Qabiṣa b. Du’aib was questioned on it [‘Aabdalmalik’s verdict]. He said: “If you had diminished it and flogged each of them with 20 lashes [, it would have been more appropriate].”

c) ‘Abdarrazzāq from Ma’mar from Zuhri from Sulaimān b. Yāsār, that ‘Umar b. al-Ḥaṭṭāb imposed her complete bride wealth on the one [who] had married her during her waiting period [as compensation] for the claim he had (istahāqqa) on her [to sexual intercourse]; both must be separated (yufarrāq bainahumā); both are forbidden to marry again (yatanākahānī) for ever, and she must observe her waiting period (ta’addu) of both [marriages].

d) ‘Abdarrazzāq from Ma’mar from Zuhri, that Sulaimān and Ibn al-Musayyab had different opinions. Zuhri said: [Ibn al-Musayyab said:]91 “She is entitled to her bride wealth.” Sulaimān said: “Her bride wealth goes to the treasury (bait al-māl).”

The comparison between the Muwatta’ text and Ma’mar’s version from Ibn al-Musayyab (text b), both of them certainly deriving from a common source, supports our hypothesis that some of Šaibānī’s deviations from Yahyā’s text are specifications and others are mistakes. The original name in Zuhri’s traditions was certainly Tulaiha, perhaps even Tulaiha b. ‘Ubaidallāh; “al-Asadiyya” seems to be an addition by Yahyā; Šaibānī added the nasab (bint Talha b. ‘Ubaidallāh).93 The problem is that the two notions are incompatible, for Talha b. ‘Ubaidallāh was of Taim b. Murra, not of Asad. Ma’mar’s “Tulaiha bint ‘Ubaidallāh” completes the confusion, but it is probably the original version because it is corroborated by another early tradition, that of ‘Abdalkarīm [al-Ḡazarī] (d. 127/745),94 transmitted by Ibn Ġuraig (here the woman is called “Tulaiha bint ‘Ubaidallāh, the sister of Tulaiha b. ‘Ubaidallāh”).95 Uncertainty about the reading of a hand-written text lacking dia-critical points may have led to doubts about the correct name of the second husband (Ibn Munabbih or Ibn Munayyah) which appears only in Šaibānī’s version.

Ma’mar’s and Mālik’s versions are hardly the result of copying the same manuscript. The differences not only in vocabulary but also in the sequence of the arguments are too great for such an assumption. That means either that one or both transmitters obtained the text by oral transmission – this does not exclude the possibility that also written notes were used as memory aids – or that Zuhri did not always tell the tradition in exactly the same form, or that both possibilities occurred at the same time.
Ma'mar reports the caliph 'Umar's verdict in two very different versions from two different informants of Zuhri's (Ibn al-Musayyab, Sulaiman b. Yasar), whereas Malik gives only one text from the same two scholars. This suggests that the state of affairs offered by Ma'mar is the more original one because it is not probable that two different persons told the same story in exactly the same words. The collective version of Ibn al-Musayyab and Sulaiman must have been created later, either by Zuhri himself or – more likely – by Malik. It was probably Malik as well who deleted Sulaiman's opinion about the issue of who was entitled to the bride wealth due for the void marriage, because it neither corresponded to his own doctrine nor to that of Zuhri, as can be inferred from another tradition.96

Ibn Guraiq's version of the story is as follows:

e) 'Abdarrazzaq from Ibn Guraiq; he said: Ibn Sihab transmitted to me from ['Ubaidallah b. Utba and Abu Salama b. 'Abdarrahman, that 'Umar b. al-Hashtab separated (farraqa baina) a woman, who had married in her waiting period, from her husband. Then he decided (qadd): "If a woman (ayyumat maratit) marries in her waiting period [but] her husband did not [yet] consummate the marriage (lam yadhul biha), both must be separated (yufarraqu bainahum); she must complete what remains of her waiting period (ta'taddu ma baqya); when it is finished, the second man can marry her [again] (hataba fi l-huttah); if she wants she can marry him, if she does not want [anymore], she can abstain from it. [But] if he has consummated the marriage with her [already], then both are forbidden to marry (yaqtami'ani) another again for ever; she must complete [first] her waiting period of [the marriage with] the first [husband], then observe the waiting period (ta'taddu) of [the marriage with] the second one.98

In Ibn Guraiq's transmission, 'Umar's dictum shows greater similarity in structure and vocabulary with Malik's version than with Ma'mar's, though there are also variations. The historical introduction is missing, as well as the names of the persons involved, and, most oddly, two other persons are mentioned as Zuhri's informants of the case. Must we conclude from these facts that Ibn Guraiq shortened the original text and consciously changed the names of Zuhri's informants? Or did he forget the original version and then cover up the gap in his memory by producing arbitrarily two other names as informants? Such conclusions are not compelling. According to the biographical information mentioned above, Ibn Ġuraiğ obtained most of his Zuhrī traditions not by hearing them from him or reading them out to him, but in written form – perhaps he even copied the manuscript of one of Zuhrī’s students – together with an ǧāza, i.e. a permission to transmit the material.99 If this was so, fading memory cannot have been the cause of the differences in his version. Furthermore, Ibn Ġuraiğ usually does not hesitate to admit memory gaps and mark them as such. If fading memory is not the cause, why then should he have fabricated the names? At least, this was not his habit, as I have shown elsewhere.100

If Zuhrī knew two different traditions about ‘Umar’s judgment – Ibn al-Musayyab’s and Sulaimān b. Yasār’s – it is possible that the story of the case was more widely known and that other Medinan scholars commented upon it as well, for example, the scholars mentioned by Ibn Ġuraiğ. This is corroborated by the fact that the story is also reported from other people. Apart from Zuhrī, Ibn Ġuraiğ transmits it from the ‘Irāqi scholar ‘Abdalkarīm [al-Ǧazari], who had been for some time a student of Ibn al-Musayyab’s, and from the Meccan scholar ‘Amr [b. Dinār], who likewise had contacts with the Medinan fuqahā, but Ibn Ġuraiğ does not give the informants from whom these scholars obtained the tradition. Ma‘mar quotes it in a short form through his Başran colleague Ayyūb [b. Abī Tamīma] from the latter’s teacher Abū Qilāba, and Sufyān at-Ṭaurī transmits a reminiscence of it via Ḥammād from Ibrāhīm [an-Naḥa’ī].101

It is not plausible to assume that Zuhrī himself invented additional informants, for he could more easily have named them all in a collective isnād instead of fabricating special texts for them. At most, we can assume that Zuhrī could not always correctly remember his sources when quoting the story from memory. Such a hypothesis, however, seems less plausible than the idea that several different versions of one and the same case were in circulation. The peculiarity that Ibn Ğuraiğ names informants other than Ma‘mar and Mālik for Zuhri’s traditions can be explained, therefore, by the assumption that he reproduces variant traditions of Zuhri’s which are independent of those transmitted from him by Ma‘mar and Mālik. The fact that the historical background of the case is lacking in Ibn Ğuraiğ’s version may be in its favour as well.

We have compared the variants of one single Zuhri tradition about a verdict of the caliph ‘Umar b. al-Ḥattāb as contained in three very early corpora of traditions. What is the final result of this comparison? 1) This tradition probably really comes from Zuhri. So the story already circulated in the first quarter of the second century A.H. 2) Ibn Šihāb hardly invented it himself or picked it up from someone whose name he concealed, naming other persons as his informants, since he reports also the ihtilaf, i.e. the differences of opinion of his informants, and he admits his ignorance concerning a detail of the story (the question as to how many lashes ‘Umar sentenced each of the culprits to). 3) The story certainly goes back to the tabi‘an generation, i.e. dates from the last quarter of the first century A.H. Having regard to the early date, it shows a considerably high level of literary skill and legal reflection. The story contains many formal elements that, according to Schacht’s criteria, are to be considered late or secondary: a. an introduction containing narrative elements (qiṣṣa) and names of the persons involved in the case; b. a very long and complex legal sentence which not only offers a solution in a concrete case – here, a marriage concluded during the waiting period – but also reflects hypothetical conditions which may be relevant in similar cases (the marriage during the waiting period with or without consummation). 4) The dictum, which in Mālik’s version consists of 47 words, is not in accordance with the short “legal maxims” which Schacht put at the beginning of the development of Islamic jurisprudence. Yet the dictum belongs to its beginnings. This shows that a reconstruction of the development of the fiqh that is based primarily on the text (matn) of the legal traditions does not lead to reliable results. 5) If it is true that the case and its solution by ‘Umar were transmitted in varying versions by different fuqahā' of the tābi‘ūn generation, the story must go back to a common source or have a historical core. Since there is no circumstantial evidence for a common source, we must assume a historical core, even if none of Zuhrī’s informants can have really experienced the time of ‘Umar’s caliphate because of their age, let alone have witnessed the case in question. We can imagine that the tradition transmitted by Zuhrī from Sulaimān b. Yasār (text c) relates the historical core, i.e. the concrete case and the caliph’s solution. The extension to the hypothetical cases of whether consummation occurred or not and the questions of how to deal with the waiting periods and whether remarriage is possible may be the result of the discussion that took place afterwards among the fuqahā' who transmitted the case. We cannot be certain whether the concrete case was really solved by the second caliph in the form reported, since none of the transmitters was an eye-witness. But the possibility that ‘Umar dealt with such a case cannot be ruled out. In view of the early date of the tradition it is more than just a possibility.

VI

Our analysis of a Zuhrī tradition about ‘Umar has shown that there are Companion traditions that can be dated to the last quarter or even the last half of the first century A.H., a possibility which Schacht categorically excluded. This is only one of several cases of early Companion traditions. But what should we think of Zuhrī’s ahādīt from the Prophet which, according to Schacht, belong in principle to a still younger stage of legal development than the Companion traditions? This issue will be discussed in the following on the basis of another example.

a) Yahyā transmitted to me from Mālik from Ibn Ṣīhāb, that (annahu) he was asked about the suckling of adults (raḍāʾat al-kabīr); he said: ‘Urwa b. az-Zubair transmitted to me:
Abū Ḥudayfa b. ‘Utba b. Rabī’ā - he belonged to the Companions of the messenger of God (eulogy) and took part in the battle of Badr - had adopted Sālim, who was called Sālim, the māulā of Abū Ḥudayfa, just as the messenger of God (eulogy) had adopted Zāid b. Ḥārīta. Abū Ḥudayfa had married Sālim, whom he considered his son, with the daughter of his brother, Fāṭima bint al-Walid b. ‘Utba b. Rabī’ā. She belonged at that time to the first emigrants and to the noblest (min afdal) unmarried women of Quraysh. When God (eulogy) revealed in his book what he revealed about Zāid b. Ḥārīta and said: “Call them after their fathers! That is more equitable in God’s eyes. If you do not know their fathers, then [let them be] your brothers in faith and your clients (mawālt), every one of those [adopted sons] was traced back to his father; [but] if his father was unknown, he was traced back (rudda) to his patron (māulā).

Sahla bint Suhail - she was Abū Ḥudayfa’s wife and belonged to the Banū ‘Āmir b. Lu’āyy - came to the messenger of God (eulogy) and said: “Messenger of God! We considered Sālim as [our] son (zalad) and he was used to come in to me [even] when I was in underwear; we have only one house [in which we cannot live together since Sālim is not our son anymore]. What is your opinion about his case? The messenger of God (eulogy) said to her: “Suckle him [i.e. give him from your milk] five times (hams raḍāʾāt)!” So he became prohibited through her milk and she regarded him as a “milk son” (ibn ān min ar-raḍāʾa) [and consequently he could frequent her without restrictions].

‘Ā’īša, the “mother of the believers” adopted [that method] with the men she wanted to be able to come to see her, and she ordered her sister Umm Kulṭūm bint Abī Bakr as-Ṣiddiq and the daughters of her brother to suckle whichever men she wanted to come in to see her.

The other wives of the Prophet (eulogy) refused to let anyone come in to them on the basis of that [form of] suckling. They said: “No, by God! We consider that what the messenger of God (eulogy) ordered Sahla bint Suhail [to do] only as a permisssion of the messenger of God (eulogy)\textsuperscript{145} for the suckling of Sālim alone.\textsuperscript{146} No,\textsuperscript{147} by God! Nobody can come in to us by this [form of] suckling.”

This was the practice (\textit{'ala bādā kāna})\textsuperscript{148} of the wives of the Prophet (eulogy)\textsuperscript{149} concerning the suckling of adults.\textsuperscript{150}

I have presented Mālik’s text in three versions: the one transmitted by Yahyā b. Yahyā and, in the notes, the differences of the transmissions by Šaibānī and ‘Ab­darrazzāq. The differences between the two latter versions and Yahyā’s may be summarised as follows: shorter text; some insignificant additions; a few other verbal forms which may be due to copyist errors; and other titles for the Prophet. Yahyā’s version seems to offer, to a large extent, the more original text, but it has additions in some places (for example, more complete names) where Šaibānī’s and ‘Abdarrazzāq’s texts correspond to one another against Yahyā. In spite of the differences, the texts of the three variants correspond to such a high degree that they must be the result of essentially written transmission from a common source that can be identified as Mālik’s teaching. Whether the differences between the three versions, for example, the varying length of the quotations from the Qur’ān, are due to the students or to a varying transmission by Mālik himself, remains uncertain.

An important difference in ‘Abdarrazzāq’s transmission, not marked in my translation of the text, concerns the \textit{isnād}. Yahyā introduces the tradition with “\textit{an Mālik ‘an Ibn Šihāb...fa-qāla: ahbarani...}”, Šaibānī has “\textit{ahbaranā Mālik, ahbaranā Ibn Šihāb...fa-qāla: ahbaranī...}” and in both cases the \textit{isnād} ends with ‘Urwa b. az-Zubair. ‘Abdarrazzāq, on the contrary, has the \textit{isnād}: ‘\textit{an Mālik ‘an Ibn Šihāb ‘an ‘Urwa ‘an ‘Ā’iša}. This leads one to the conclusion that ‘Abdarrazzāq, who offers a more complete \textit{isnād} from Mālik than Mālik’s two other students, is responsible for the addition “\textit{an ‘Ā’iša}”. For what reason can he have added it? To provide the tradition with an unbroken transmission chain? This seems doubtful in view of the hundreds of \textit{aḥādīt} that ‘Abdarrazzāq transmits from the Prophet with a defective \textit{isnād}. It is also difficult to imagine that ‘Abdarrazzāq has not noticed that the story as a whole cannot possibly have been told by ‘Ä‘iša because she is mentioned in it not in the first, but in the third person.

A first clue to the solution of this problem is offered by the analysis of the text which is, by the way, one of the most elaborate stories among Mālik’s legal traditions. By dividing the translation of the text into paragraphs, I have tried show that it consists of four independent stories. The tradition starts with the story of Abū Ḥuḍaifa and his adopted son Sālim that is a sort of prologue for the following story about Sahla and the fatwā of the Prophet. Two reports about the practice of the Prophet’s wives are added; the first concerns only ‘Ä‘iša, the second deals with the other wives of the Prophet. The composition is closed by a concluding sentence that recalls again the topic of the entire tradition.

In view of this skilful composition, the issue of authorship must be broken down into the question of who is the author of the entire composition and who are the authors of its different parts. The question whether it was Mālik, Zuhri or ‘Urwa who tied the discrete traditions together cannot be answered on the basis of Mālik’s text. A comparison with other early versions of the tradition will take us a step further.

b) ‘Abdarrazzāq from Ma‘mar from Zuhri from ‘Urwa from ‘Ä‘iša; she said: Sahla bint Suhail b. ‘Amr came to the Prophet (eulogy) and said: “Sālim used to be called (yud‘a) after Abū Ḥuḍaifa and [now] God (eulogy) has revealed in his book: ‘Call them after their fathers!’ He used to come in to me while I was in underwear (fudul) [and this was inevitable since] we live [together] in a flat (manzil).” The Prophet (eulogy) said: “Suckle Sālim [so that] you are forbidden (tahrumi) for him.”

Zuhri said: Some of the Prophet’s (eulogy) wives said: “We do not know whether this was only a permission granted for Salim alone (ḥassatan) [or not].”

Zuhri said [moreover]: Until she died, ‘Ä‘iša used to give the legal advice (tuftī) that suckling after weaning makes forbidden [for marriage].\footnote{\textit{\textsuperscript{15}}}{\textsuperscript{15}}
c) ‘Abdarrazzāq transmitted to us; he said: Ibn Ġuraig transmitted to us; he said: Ibn Šihāb transmitted to me (ahharani); he said: ‘Urwa transmitted to me from ‘Ā’iša: Abū Ḥudaifa adopted Sālim – he was a client (maulā) of a woman from the Anṣār – just as the Prophet (eulogy) [adopted] Zaid. If someone adopted a man in the Ġahiliyya, people called him his son and he inherited from his inheritance. [This was the habit] until God (eulogy) revealed: “Call them after their fathers. If you do not know their fathers, then [let them be] your brothers in faith.” So they were traced back to their fathers [and] whoever’s father was unknown, [became] a client (maulā) and a brother in faith. After it [the revelation] Sahla came [to the Prophet] and said: “Messenger of God! We were used to consider Sālim as [our] son (walad) who lived together with us and saw me in underwear (fudul). God has [now] revealed what you know.” The Prophet said: “Suckle him five times (hams raḍāʿāt).” So he acquired the status of her “milk son”.

These two Zuhri traditions, the one by Ma‘mar and the other by Ibn Ġuraig, are undoubtedly parallel texts to Mālik’s. Ibn Ġuraig’s text is limited, however, to a shortened version of the Sahla story and its prologue and it ignores the reactions of the Prophet’s wives to his fatwā. The three texts correspond mainly in content, even though many correspondences in wording occur. There are also contradictions. According to Ma‘mar, for example, the wives of the Prophet (apart from ‘Ā’iša) confessed that they did not know whether the fatwā of the Prophet was meant generally, whereas in Mālik’s version they vehemently reject its general interpretation. This difference can be ascribed to an imprecise way of retelling the story, since Ma‘mar did know the negative attitude of the other wives of the Prophet as well, as we shall see below. Ibn Ġuraig’s and Ma‘mar’s versions tally with each other against Mālik’s in that they trace the Sahla story back via ‘Urwa to ‘Ā’iša. Since two students independently report this isnād from Zuhri, it must be his. This finding helps us to answer the question, asked above, as to why ‘Abdarrazzāq completed Mālik’s isnād. It seems likely that he did so because he realised that in Zuhri’s transmission the core of the tradition, the Sahla story, was originally ascribed to ‘Ā’iša, rather than because he wanted to fake an unbroken transmission chain for a hadīt of the Prophet.
In Ma‘mar’s version, Zuhri does not refer explicitly to Urwa when reporting the legal opinions of Ā’iṣa and the other wives of the Prophet. We can only infer from Ma‘mar’s isnād of the Sahla story that Urwa may be Zuhri’s informant for these parts as well. Yet there is a way to become certain about it. Ibn Ğuraig who, as mentioned above, does not say anything about an opinion or practice of Ā’iṣa in his Zuhri tradition, reports from his teacher ‘Atā’ b. Abi Rabāḥ the following:

I heard ‘Atā’ when he was being asked. A man told him: “A woman let me drink from her milk after I had become a grown up man. May I marry her?” ‘Atā’ said: “No.” I said [to him]: “Is this your ra’y?” He said: “Yes.” ‘Atā’ said [moreover]: “Ā’iṣa ordered [to do] that to the daughters of her brother (kānat Ā’iṣa ta’muru bi-dālika banāti āḥiḥā).”

The last sentence is obviously a reference to the tradition about Ā’iṣa as it is found in Mālik’s version of Ibn Śihāb’s Urwa tradition concerning the suckling of adults. But who is ‘Atā’’s source for it? As Urwa was an older contemporary of ‘Atā’’s and, explicitly, his informant for several traditions, we can assume that he was ‘Atā’’s source for this tradition as well, whereas we can exclude ‘Atā’’s having heard it from the younger Zuhri, from whom, as far as I know, he did not transmit.

Was Urwa also Zuhri’s source for the opinion of the other wives of the Prophet? This cannot be ruled out completely, but it seems doubtful in view of a Zuhri tradition transmitted by Ibn Sa’d via Wāqidī from Ma‘mar:

Muḥammad b. ‘Umar transmitted to me; Ma‘mar and Muḥammad b. Abdallāh transmitted to me from Zuhri from Abū ‘Ubaida from ‘Abdallāh b. Zama’a from his mother Umm Salama; she said: The wives of the Prophet (eulogy) refused to adopt that [what Ā’iṣa was doing]. They said: “This is only a permission of the messenger of God (eulogy) for Sahla bint Suhail [alone].”

According to this report, Zuhri did not obtain his tradition about the opinion of the other wives of the Prophet from Urwa, but from another informant.
(Abū 'Ubaida) who finally traces the story back to one of the wives of the Prophet, Umm Salama, an old opponent of 'Ā'īṣa's. If this is true, we must conclude that Mālik omitted that particular isnād and ascribed all parts of Zuhri's story to 'Urwa. We do not know his reasons for doing so. Moreover, Mālik left out 'Ā'īṣa's name in the isnād. He had reasons to do that because she could be the source of neither the report about her own practice in which she is mentioned in the third person, nor the tradition about the objections of the other wives of the Prophet which is clearly critical of 'Ā'īṣa.

Ma'mar's version of the Sahla story reveals, finally, that it was Zuhrī who had already put together the Abū Ḥudayfah-Sālim-Sahla tradition with the reports about the practice of opinions of the Prophet's wives, for Ma'mar's and Mālik's transmission coincide in this respect.

A comparison of the several variants transmitted from Zuhrī thus leads to the conclusion that either Zuhrī himself circulated the traditions about the suckling of adults at different periods of time in varying form, or that his students are responsible for the differences between the texts. If the latter hypothesis is correct, Mālik's version must be considered the one that best preserved Zuhrī's original text (apart from the isnād). By contrast, the versions of Ma'mar and Ibn Ğuraǧ look like abbreviated versions. One could also assume, of course, that Zuhrī's original version was short and that Mālik expanded it, but this is less likely in view of the correspondence between Mālik's version and 'Atā's reference to the story which shows that the report about 'Ā'īṣa was already part of the original version. Whatever the case, the important result that our comparison of early variants of a Prophetical hadīt produces is that it is an authentic Zuhrī tradition, i.e. really goes back to Zuhrī.

What should we think of Zuhrī's claim, however, that he obtained the Sahla story and the report about 'Ā'īṣa's practice from 'Urwa b. az-Zubair (d. 93/711-2 or
There are several arguments against the assumption that Zuhri invented the tradition about the suckling of adults himself. First, one can point to the fact that the tradition ends with an ihtilaf, a difference of opinion between the wives of the Prophet, which leaves open the question about the author’s own point of view. Secondly, we know from another early tradition, reporting Zuhri’s ra’y, that he objected to the practice described in the ahadit from the Prophet and ‘Ā’iša. It is hard to imagine that Zuhri faked those ahadit that were completely inconsistent with his own legal opinion, or that he would have accepted them from someone he did not know very well. Furthermore, the reference of the Meccan scholar ‘Ata’ to the practice of ‘Ā’iša suggests, as argued above, that ‘Urwa was the source of the tradition. This all tends to support the assumption that Zuhri really received the tradition from ‘Urwa, as he claims in his isnād.

In ‘Urwa’s case we can ask the same questions. Is he the author of the texts? Did he actually obtain his information from ‘Ā’iša, as claimed in the isnād? We can only weigh the pros and cons of the evidence offered by the texts. There is an argument against the assumption that ‘Urwa invented the tradition in question: the fact that he himself and other Medinan fuqahā of his generation, such as the leading scholar Ibn al-Musayyab, disapproved of the suckling of adults and denied that it had any legal consequences. It does not seem reasonable to assume that ‘Urwa fabricated a hadit from the Prophet that contradicted his own legal doctrine so blatantly. Yet if he obtained the hadit from somebody, the question arises as to whom he got it from. His aunt ‘Ā’iša is a possible or even obvious source, but more convincing is the fact that he reports from her a practice that was rejected both by the other wives of the Prophet and the leading early Medinan fuqahā, himself included. So, ‘Urwa’s claim that he obtained the tradition from ‘Ā’iša seems to be substantiated. That means that the hadīt about the Prophet’s fatwā for Sahla is a very early one that can be dated to the first half of the first century A.H. (‘Ā’iša died 58/678). Probably this hadīt is not only early but is also an authentic tradition from the Prophet, i.e. it reports – decades later, it is true – an event that actually occurred. during the life of the Prophet. Circumstantial evidence for this assumption may be that Umm Salama in the tradition transmitted from her does not dispute the event as such, which we would expect if 'Ā'īša had invented the entire story.

The results of our source-critical analysis contrast sharply with Schacht’s ideas about this type of legal tradition. Schacht would not have accepted that Mālik’s hadīt about the suckling of adults is early because of its length; the narrative elements and the names contained in it; and, last but not least, because of the simple fact that it is a tradition from the Prophet. Schacht would have seen various tendencies at work in this tradition and would have argued as follows:

The part of the tradition which describes the practice of 'Ā’īša is a product of the “traditionists” aimed at changing the doctrine of the old Medinan school of jurisprudence. This originally anonymous doctrine, that was probably advocated by Zuhri, had somewhat earlier been fictitiously ascribed to Ibn al-Musayyab and ‘Urwa b. az-Zubair. In the forged 'Ā’īša tradition, a typical tactic of the “traditionists” can be seen, namely, attributing their “countertraditions” to the same persons who are claimed by the “ancient schools” as representatives of their doctrine, in this case, Zuhri, Ibn al-Musayyab and Sulaimān b. Yasār. Zuhri as transmitter of the tradition is, therefore, a fake and the argument based on the practice of 'Ā’īša must have emerged after Zuhri’s death. The followers of the “ancient schools”, now on the defensive, struck back with a tradition saying that all other wives of the Prophet rejected the attitude of 'Ā’īša. This tradition must be somewhat later than that about 'Ā’īša. The “traditionist” reacted by producing the story about Sahla together with a fatwā of the Prophet himself. This tradition is, accordingly, the last link in the chain of arguments. Finally, the particular elements of the debate were put together in a single tradition which Mālik found, if he did not produce it himself. All these developments must have occurred between Zuhri’s death and the compilation of Mālik’s Muwāṭṭa’. The origin of the tradition about the suckling of adults as found in the Muwatta' must then be dated to around the middle of the second century A.H.

Schacht did not deal with this tradition as thoroughly as I did here in adopting his method of reasoning. He only gave hints as to how to interpret it. Yet whoever is familiar with his way of thinking will recognise it in my aforementioned summary. In view of the results gained by a source-critical study of the early transmissions from Zuhri in general and of two traditions transmitted from him in particular – one referring to 'Umar, the other to the Prophet – Schacht’s method and his ideas about the origins of Islamic jurisprudence are questionable.

VII

To summarise the arguments presented in this article let us return to the starting point. According to the view decisively shaped by the writings of Joseph Schacht and since then current among Western scholars of Islam, the number of reliable legal traditions going back to Ibn Šihāb az-Zuhri is very small. It must be limited to the information about Zuhri’s ra’y which Mālik in his Muwatta' explicitly says he heard himself or asked Zuhri about. This view has been challenged in this article. Apart from the Muwatta' other early sources have become available since the publication of Schacht’s Origins that can be used for a reconstruction of Zuhri’s legal doctrines and traditions. A source-critical study of the early sources now available shows that the number of texts that can be attributed to Zuhri is much larger than Schacht thought. A comparison of the Zuhri texts preserved in early sources leads to the conclusion that his legal teaching did not at all consist of ra’y alone, but also included – for an important part – traditions about the legal opinions and the practice of the preceding generations of Muslims, Successors, Companions and the Prophet. On the basis of the numerous legal texts that Zuhri’s students transmitted in their compilations, a detailed picture of his jurisprudence can be drawn. But what is more, the state of development which Islamic jurisprudence had reached in the first quarter of the second century A.H. can be reconstructed, and partly even the preliminary stages of the first century. The sources are now available to venture on such reconstructions.
Notes:

6 This is the English version of my article “Der Fiqh des –Zuhri: die Quellenproblematik” which was published in Der Islam 68 (1991). I wish to thank Sergio Noja Nosed who encouraged the translation and published a first (unrevised) version in the journal Taquino-Taqvim 1 (2000), Miss Barbara Paoli who made a first translation and Mrs. Vivien Reid who carefully revised the translation.

3 Ibidem. Emphasis mine

4 Ibidem. Emphasis mine

5 Cf. op. cit., pp. 163, 175.

7 Op. cit., p. 245. Emphasis mine. A similar judgement concerning Zuhri's transmissions was made by G.H.A. Juynboll in his book Muslim Tradition. Studies in Chronology, Provenance and Authorship of early Hadith, Cambridge 1983, p. 158: "...it is no longer possible to sift the genuine Zuhri traditions from the fabricated ones, or as is my contention, even the genuine Ibn Shihab al-Zuhri traditions from the possible hundreds of pseudo-Zuhri ones.”

8 Mālik, Muwatta' 29:30 (quoted is the number of the book and after the colons the number under which the transmission in the current edition of M.F. ‘Abdalbāqi is found).

9 Mālik, Muwatta', 29:55.

11 See the preceding note.

12 The percentages are rounded. They are based on a sample of 1499 texts of Ma'mar's, contained in the books "Kitāb an-Nikāḥ" and "Kitāb at-Talaq" of ‘Abdarrazzāq’s Muṣannaf, i.e. vol. 6 and 7, nos. 10243-14053. This sample is representative for most of the books of the Muṣannaf.

13 Cf. ‘Abdarrazzāq, Muṣannaf, 10838. For the different genres cf. Motzki, Anfänge, pp. 72-75.

14 For example: ‘Abdarrazzāq, Muṣannaf, 10806, 10922. In Zuhri’s texts this genre appears five times more often.

15 Frequency: 18% in Zuhri’s, 22% in Qatāda’s texts.

16 This occasionally occurs in traditions as well. Cf. for example ‘Abdarrazzāq, Muṣannaf, 10924.

17 Cf. ‘Abdarrazzāq, Muṣannaf, 10519.

18 Cf. ‘Abdarrazzāq, Muṣannaf, 10681.

19 Cf. ‘Abdarrazzāq, Muṣannaf, 11110.

20 ‘Abdarrazzāq, Muṣannaf, 11756.

21 Additions in square brackets are added by me for a better understanding.

22 ‘Abdarrazzāq, Muṣannaf, 11943.

23 But such cases can be found sporadically, as in ‘Abdarrazzāq, Muṣannaf, 10792.

24 ‘Abdarrazzāq, Muṣannaf, 11962.

portant biographical traditions about Ma’mar are to be found in Ibn ‘Asākir’s Ta’rīḥ Madinat Dimashq and Dahabi’s Siyār a’lām an-nubala’.

39 F. Sezgin was one of the first to mention it in his article “Hadis musannefatinin mebdei ve Ma’mer b. Râṣid’in Câmi’i”, in: Türkiye 12 (1955) pp. 115-134. M.J. Kister was one of the first using it even before it was published. Cf. his article “Hadithü ‘an bani isrā’ila wa-lâ-ḥaraja”, in: Israel Oriental Studies 2 (1972), pp. 215-239.

41 The following observations are based on the same text corpus as in the previous chapter, see note 12.

42 Cf. Motzki, Anfänge, p. 70-85.

44 Cf. ‘Abdarrazzāq, Muṣannaf, 13632.

46 See above p. 9-10.

52 ‘Abdarrazzâq, Muṣannaf, 12193. It follows a note about the name of the woman which probably belonged originally to the preceding tradition. For examples of sama’ cf. ‘Abdarrazzâq, Muṣannaf, 10680, 13803. For a better understanding of the text it has to be noted that the reported decision of the caliph ‘Utmân shattered the plan of a man who, during his illness knew he would die, separated from his wife to exclude her from his inheritance and to avoid the Qur’ānic inheritance rules.

53 To show it in detail, a special analysis would be necessary.

54 In the following the recension of the Muwatta’ by Yahyâ b. Yahyâ al-Laitî is taken as the point of reference. The shorter version by Šaibâni will be used only occasionally. As in the case of ‘Abdarrazzâq’s Muṣannaf, the three books Kitâb an-nikah, Kitâb at-talaq and Kitâb ar-rida’ are chosen as sample.

55 In comparison: in Ma’mar’s corpus 6 %, in that of Ibn Ğurağ 8 %.

56 Mâlîk, Muwatta’, 2933.

57 Mâlîk, Muwatta’, 28:19. Such traditions are lacking generally in Šaibâni’s version of the Muwatta’.

58 For example in Mâlîk, Muwatta’, 28:40.

59 Such texts are not in our sample, but cf. Mâlîk, Muwatta’, 48:8 (via Yahyâ b. Sa’id) and 51:3 (via Šiyâd b. Sa’d).

60 However, cf. Mâlîk, Muwatta’, 3:56 (not in my sample).
Cf. the preceding note.

Cf. Schacht, Origins, p. 177, 178 f. G.H.A. Juynboll has expressed similar reservations about this isnad: “Very many forged traditions supported by this isnad probably originated during Malik’s lifetime (90-179/708-95).” Muslim Tradition, p. 143.

Cf. Schacht, Origins, p. 177.

See below p. 19.

Cf. ‘Abdarrazzaq, Muṣannaf, 12243, 12244; 13595, 13596; 13807, 13808.

‘Abdarrazzaq, Muṣannaf, 13095.

For this sentence there is also a special transmission by Ma’mar; cf. ‘Abdarrazzaq, Muṣannaf, 13081 (13080).

‘Abdarrazzaq, Muṣannaf, 13096.

‘Abdarrazzaq, Muṣannaf, 13500.

Among others, the Zuhri texts collected by ‘Abdarrazzaq under the title “Bāb ar-rağm wa-l-iḥsān”; Muṣannaf, vol. 7, pp. 315 ff.

Malik, Muwatta’, 29:46.

Lacking in the manuscript probably due to an transmission error.

‘Abdarrazzaq, Muṣannaf, 12238.

The text of the edition has Ma’mar, but this is certainly an error, for in Ma’mar’s asānid the name Zuhri is always used.

‘Abdarrazzaq, Muṣannaf, 12239.

Malik, Muwatta’, 29, chap. 7.

‘Abdarrazzaq, Muṣannaf, 13190.

Cf. the introduction by ‘Abdalwahhāb ‘Abdallātif, the editor of Saibāni’s recension, p. 22.

Š: “the daughter of Taḥa b. ‘Ubaidallāh” instead of Ṭulaiha al-Asadiyya. The letter Š refers to Saibāni’s riwāya of the Muwatta’.

Š: lam yankahhā.

in Š lacking.

Š: from her vagina.

This does not preclude that Mālik, nevertheless, received the tradition from Zuhri.

This name was probably lost, as the context of the traditions show.

See above, p. 13.

'Abdarrazzāq, Muṣannaf, 10541, 10542, 10543. In the first two texts “Ruṣaid at-Ṭaqaḥ” appears as the name of the second husband. This accords with Ma‘mar’s version (see text b) and this was probably Ibn al-Musayyab’s text. Mālik’s version seems to be due to a mistake.

Cf. the text b of Ma‘mar on p. 26-27.

S: wa. The translation is based on Yahyā b. Yahyā’s recension of the Muwatta. The differences found in the versions of Saibānī and ‘Abdarrazzāq are given in the notes. The letters ‘A refer to ‘Abdarrazzāq’s riwāya from Mālik, the letter S again to Saibānī’s text

S: wa is missing.

‘A: wa-kāna min aṣḥāb ff. is missing.

S: wa is missing.

‘A: wa-kāna Badriyyan instead of wa-kāna qad sahida Badran.

A: la-kāna (?) instead of tabannā.

A: kanna instead of tabanna.

S: wa-hiya is missing.

A: fī min afdal.

A: “b. Ḥārita” is missing.

S: both names are missing.

A: ahmat instead of bint.

A: “b. Rabi‘a” is missing.

‘A: yaumu‘idin is placed before min afdal.

S: without eulogy. ‘A: ‘azza wa-galla instead of ta‘ala.

S: fi kitabīhi is missing.

S: “b. Ḥārita” is missing. ‘A: dalika instead of fi kitabīhī ff.

S: fī qāla is missing.

‘A: hashid instead of wahid.

‘A: tubunniya instead of min ula‘ika. ‘A: siyy (?) is added.

S: lām yakun yu‘lamu instead of lam yu‘lam.

S: fī mawālīhi.

S: wa-biyya is missing.

S: fī mā balaqanā is added. ‘A: ilā rasūli llāhi is missing.

S: yā rasūla llāh is missing.

A: ‘anā is added.

S: mā instead of mādā.

A: fī sa‘nīhi is missing; qāla Zuhri is added.

A: rasūla llāhi is missing.

Mälik, Muwatta, 30:12; Muwatta (S), no. 627. 'Abdarrazzäq, Musannaf, 13886. We must imagine the “suckling” of adults in the form of putting drops of mother milk into a dish or a drink.

He does not speak of a practice of 'Ä'isa in Ma'mar’s version.

Ibn Sa’d, Tabaqat, vol. 8, p. 198.

A tradition transmitted by Ibn Ğuraïf from his Meccan teacher Ibn Abi Mulaiqa corroborates this conclusion. The latter reported that he obtained 'A'iša’s Sahla-story from the Medinan scholar al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr. Cf. 'Abdarrazzäq, Musannaf, 13884.

Bibliography of literature quoted with short titles

Bağdādī, Aḥmad b. ʿAlī Ḥāṭib al-, Taʿrīh Bağdād, 14 vols., Cairo 1931.

— Id., Kitāb al-Kifāya fi ʿilm ar-riwaya, Hyderabad 1939.

Buḥārī, Muḥammad b. Iṣmāʿīl al-, Kitāb at-Taʿrīh al-kabīr, 8 vols. in 4, Hyderabad 1941-42.

— Id., Kitāb Duwwal al-islām, 2 vols. in 1, Hyderabad 1918.

— Id., Mīzān al-iʿtidāl fi naqd ar-riḡāl, ed. Muḥammad Badraddīn an-Naṣʿānī, Cairo 1907.

— Id., Kitāb al-Ǧarḥ wa-taʿdīl, 8 vols. in 4, Hyderabad 1952-53.

Ibn Ḥaḡar al-ʿAsqalānī, Aḥmad b. ʿAlī, Taḥdīb at-taḥdīb, 12 vols. in 6, Hyderabad 1907-09.

Ibn an-Nadīm, al-Fihrist, Cairo n.d. [1929].

Nawawī, Muḥyīddin b. Šaraf an-, Tahdīb al-asma‘ wa-l-luqāt, 3 vols., Teheran n.d.