And even to this day Heracles continues this work and you have in him a helper and protector of your government.

Dio Chrysostom, On Kingship A, 84.

The emperor Trajan carefully cultivated a close association between himself and Hercules. He encouraged orators like Dio Chrysostom and Pliny to compare him repeatedly to the strongest of the gods, depicted the deity on a multitude of coins, and perhaps even appeared as Hercules on a statue which is now on display at the Palazzo Massimo in Rome (Fig. 1). Pliny had Trajan’s Herculean qualities antedate the emperor’s reign. His actions as a general under Domitian were like Hercules’ labours: ‘You must have caused him as much admiration – mixed with fear – as that great son of Jupiter caused his king by remaining unconquered and inexhaustible after those cruel works.’ The direct praise of the princeps bonus – Trajan – is emphasized by reproaching the princeps malus for whom he had to fight; for by identifying the general Trajan with Hercules, his employer inevitably became a contemporary Eurystheus.

This form of criticism of Domitian is all the more striking when one considers the extent to which the last...
Flavian had tried to construct a connection between himself and Hercules. A statue which might show Domitian as Hercules, a Herakliskos that is prominently depicted on the armour of a cuirassed Domitian statue, and some coins and medallions testified to his purpose, as did repeated flattery:

Caesar deigning to descend to the features of Great Hercules, gives a new temple to the Latin way... Before Alcides was worshipped with prayer and the full blood of the victims; now he, the lesser, himself worships a greater Alcides.

The deity’s deeds were as nothing compared to Domitian’s gladiators, it was said, and more than Hercules, Domitian deserved deification – though only after the longest possible life. Martial was not the only author who tried to please Domitian by referring to the emperor’s preference for the deity; Statius compared the two as well, in a poem written in the context of imperial dining: ‘So grim Alcides, returning after his dread missions, delighted to prop his flank upon the out-stretched lion-skin’, he writes whilst describing his dinner at the palace. In the next poem – which celebrates the opening of the Via Domitiana – Statius continues the comparison between Domitian and Hercules, in a direct reference to Aeneid 6.791–801, which heralds Augustus as the bringer of a new Golden Age: ‘Where roving Hercules went, and Bacchus, will you go, beyond the stars and the flaming sun, the source of the Nile and the snows of Atlas.’

Valerius Flaccus’ Argonautica may also have alluded to Domitian’s Herculean grandeur. Silius Italicus’ Punica, furthermore, incorporates several references to Hercules. Although they cannot be shown to refer directly to Domitian, one would do well to point to the fact that the hero of the poem, Scipio Africanus, is a son of Jupiter whose mother has ‘a place of equal honour in [Elysium], where Leda and the mother of the great Alcides are permitted by the god to dwell’, as he finds out in his visit to the underworld. He is furthermore afterwards tempted by Virtus and Voluptas, in a passage which is not only a direct echo of the famous choice of Hercules as told by Prodicus, but one which Dio Chrysostom would later use to praise the ‘good ruler’ Trajan and condemn the ‘evil tyrant’ Domitian. It would be a brilliant display of oratory if Dio Chrysostom’s condemnation of Domitian alluded to the very passage that had earlier been used to praise Domitianic self-representation.

Yet showing himself a good and just ruler, ‘a protector of men and earth’, who, like Hercules, ‘struck down presumptuous tyrants and destroyed them’, will not have been Trajan’s sole motive for emphasizing his connection to the godhead. When, in AD 102–4 Trajan raised two new legions, he gave one of them, the Legio Secunda Traiana, the emblem of Hercules as a regimental standard. Some connection between the military, the emperor, and Hercules was probably also emphasized through two interesting coin types. One shows the emperor's face on the obverse, and a boar - an animal apt as an emblem for legions - on the reverse. The other type has an almost identical reverse, but on the obverse the portrait of Hercules. Surrounding the divinity's head is the legend IMP CAES TRAIAN AUG GERM. Hercules' head is in all respects in the place where one would expect to see the emperor. On yet another reverse, Trajan's column, 'itself a record of the Dacian victories', appears in the form of a club, while lion-skins are draped over the pedestal. The references to Trajan's Herculean qualities in defeating the Dacians are obvious. The fact that the Acts of the Arval Brothers, in January AD 101, for the only time in their long history, named Hercules Victor amongst the gods that were invoked for the safety of the emperor, could be seen as further evidence for the emphasis Trajan put on this divine conqueror. The strong warrior, and philosophical ruler, could be put to good use as a paradigm for the proven general who had come to the throne.

Hadrian seems to have understood the message. He too issued a massive number of coins depicting Hercules, but his god was very different from Trajan's. Where Trajan had, unsurprisingly, emphasized the quality of Hercules as a fighter, Hadrian depicted the god as more of a traveller. Tellingly, Hadrian brought the Hercules Gaditanus to Rome. The mythological narrative connected to this Hercules fitted in well with the imperial 'persona' that Hadrian enacted. The deity derived from the same province as the emperor, and even from the same settlement (Gades, modern-day Cadiz) as Domitia Paulina, Hadrian's mother. The parallel went further. The two Herculean labours most often connected to the temple at Gades both had (relatively) peaceful travelling as their motive. On the one hand, there was the perception that Gades was the most western place of the world, and thus the place where Hercules collected the apples of the Hesperides - the apples of eternal youth, which one can indeed recognize on some of the Hadrianic coinage. It hardly needs explaining why Hadrian wanted to stress the aspects of a deity that showed obtaining immortality through travel to the furthest parts of the world. On the other hand, some authors perceived Gades as the area explicitly connected to the capturing of Geryon's cattle. Hercules afterwards led the cattle along the shores of the Mediterranean, where they were, in the area that was to become Rome, stolen by the monster Cacus. This led to the famous fight between Cacus and Hercules, ending with the latter's victory and founding of the Ara Maxima at the Forum Boarium. In this story, then, a clear connection was laid down between the travelling deity and the city of Rome. Emphasizing how Rome benefited from the travels of a Spanish god seems anything but surprising for a much-travelling Spanish emperor.

The message, yet again, was clear. Hadrian's 'imperial, untraditional goal – the unification of all nations in the empire as equal partners', was not unlike Hercules' actions.²¹ Hercules had been universally praised for them, so who could blame the emperor for doing the same? It will come as no great surprise that Antoninus Pius' Hercules was thoroughly Roman, and that he travelled a lot less than under Antoninus' predecessor.²² Like the emperor, who, as Aristides emphasized, did not need to travel far and wide, since letters from all over the realm kept him informed,²³ Hercules too stayed in Rome. No longer did the 'foreign temples' of Hadrianic coinage form the background to reverse-types that featured Hercules.²⁴ The more traditionally Roman Hercules Invictus replaced the Hercules Gaditanus. Once more, the emperor was carefully following in the god's footsteps. Once more, those footsteps were carefully constructed to reflect the emperor's favourite style of government.

Only the philosopher-emperor Marcus Aurelius put this use of Hercules aside. He all but ignored the special deity of the Stoic school. Unlike the emperorship of the 'provincial' Trajan, the 'untraditional' Hadrian and the 'undynastic' Antoninus Pius, Marcus' position was indisputable.²⁵ Perhaps Marcus' reign was sufficiently accepted not to have to hide behind someone else's divine example.

The power base of Commodus' rule was not as all-embracing. On the one hand he had the best possible legitimation. He was a royal son in a society in which succession was, though not officially, in practice a dynastic affair.²⁶ There could have been no doubt whatsoever that Commodus would reign after his father had died. No other choice was thinkable. That was also the problem. Marcus did not choose Commodus as his successor. Commodus was born an emperor.²⁷ Appointing another successor might well have led to civil war. This shows the strength of blood relationships, but equally indicates that Commodus could hardly present himself as the choice of the SPQR. Even if the princeps knew his only son to be a liability, there was precious little he could do to promote someone else – except killing his son. Similar problems had existed at the Ottoman court, where Süleyman the Magnificent (1520–66) killed two of his sons to make succession easier for his remaining child Selim II (1566–74), even employing the services of an official court-strangler.²⁸ The fact that Marcus did not choose to resort to this tells us little. Apparently, he did not want to be responsible for his son's death – but this did mean that Commodus was going to be his father's successor.
For well over eighty years Roman successors had been, to an extent, chosen. The ‘system’ had not been a positive choice (four successive emperors, from Nerva to Antoninus Pius, simply happened to have no children), and candidates were picked from an exclusive group of imperial relatives, but a choice they still were. All the emperors succeeding Domitian had experience as a general and/or administrator. Commodus lacked that experience. He needed to show that he was able to perform the task that his dynastic background automatically set him.

Commodus turned to Hercules as a legitimating paradigm, as numerous emperors had done before him. Commodus’ Hercules, unsurprisingly, was shown to be a ruler through divine birth — though his godly powers were strongly emphasized as well. A Herakliskos-statue in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, (probably) depicting Commodus, strengthens this suggestion (Fig. 2). The statue seems to have been made late in Commodus’ reign. Commodus, as we shall discuss shortly, eventually attempted to present himself as a ‘new Hercules’. Suggesting that he had been the ‘god incarnate’ from infancy onwards, and that his youthful ascent derived from his god-like qualities, seems to be consistent with such a divine presentation. To an extent, this can be compared to the legitimating strategy of reification: ‘A transitory, historical state of affairs is presented as if it were permanent, natural, outside of time.’ Commodus may have been ‘just’ an emperor; as the new Hercules he had always been, and would be eternal.

When Trajan used Hercules as a ‘legitimizing paradigm’, speeches, statues and coins, were employed to get the message broadcast. In doing so, two of the four ‘vehicles for propaganda and legitimation’ that were at imperial disposal were used. For there are four such vehicles recognized in some recent studies on the dissemination of ideology in pre-industrial states: literary and rhetorical, iconographical, symbolic, and ceremonial. ‘Iconographical’ here denotes a narrative ‘iconographical programme’ – an attempt to display ideological claims through iconography in context. Relevant examples would be the reliefs on the Ara Pacis, or even clearer, on the columns of Trajan and Marcus Aurelius, or Antoninus’ column base. ‘Symbolic’ indicates the use of actual loose (religious) symbols for political use – ensuring ‘the potential for impersonalized representations of the Crown’. That is, specific symbols end up denoting specific related powers even when shown outside of any further context: the crown for royalty, the cross for the church, etc. Such material symbols were – as far as is known – not carried round by Trajan, nor often independently depicted on coins or monuments. There is no surviving evidence that hints at Trajan wielding the club in public. Only some coins might constitute the use of the ‘symbolic’. Three uncommon Quadrans-types show Hercules’ club on the reverse. Their obverses, however, show Hercules himself, with the lion’s skin. The emperor himself is conspicuously absent, though of course a connection between the emperor and the divinity is made through the legend surrounding Hercules’ head. As for the use of ceremonies in proclaiming the emperor’s connection to Hercules, nothing is mentioned.

Commodus, on the other hand, mobilized all possible means to portray himself as the new Hercules. Coins depicting the emperor with, or as, Hercules were abundantly minted. Others merely depicted a club, making clear that the attribute symbolized the emperor and his reign. ‘Vast numbers of statues were erected representing him in the garb of Hercules. And it was voted that this age should be named the Golden Age’, stated Dio (72.15.6: καὶ ἀνδριάντες αὐτοῦ παμπληθεῖς ἐν Ὡρακλέους σχῆματι ἔστησαν, καὶ τὸν αἰῶνα τὸν ἐπ’ αὐτοῦ χρυσοφίτο τε ὀνομάζεσθαι). Some of these statues have survived, most famously the so-called Capitoline Bust (Fig. 3). This statue clearly displays all the attributes of Hercules; lion-skin, club, and the apples of the Hesperides are prominent. The emperor’s supreme powers are further stressed through symbols on the pedestal. Zodiacal signs which enliven the globe that supports the statue might well refer to important dates in both Commodus' and Hercules' lives,\(^3\) and adjacent cornucopias and Victories seem to symbolize the peace and abundance that Commodus' reign has brought. The statue was also flanked by two tritons, emphasizing rule over the seas, and holding a parapetasma over Commodus' head; a design which was common for sarcophagi of the time. It thus suggested that 'Commodus himself had become immortal'.\(^3\) The message was unavoidable: Commodus was more than a mere mortal.

Fig. 3. Capitoline Bust of Commodus with the attributes of Hercules, courtesy Sovraintendenza Comunale - Musei d’Arte Antica: Musei Capitolini, Rome. (photo: DAI-Rom 1938.1321).

A colossal statue of the Lysippean 'weary-Hercules', now in a niche next to the courtyard of the Palazzo Pitti in Florence, further shows the extent of identification (Fig. 4). This resting giant had its head actually replaced by that of Commodus, who thus presented himself as the deity. The hairstyle, however – normally the strongest characteristic for recognizing an emperor – is not that of Commodus, but of Hercules. Lysippus was, of course, the court-artist of Alexander the Great, and copies of his statues undoubtedly made reference to that famous Hellenistic leader, a link that Commodus' contemporary Athenaeus also made:

What wonder, then, that the emperor Commodus of our time also had the club of Hercules lying beside him, and desired to be called Hercules, seeing that Alexander, Aristotle's pupil, got himself up like so many gods, to say nothing of the goddess Artemis.\(^3\)

Ceremonies, too, were exploited as a 'vehicle' to propagate the new god-emperor, and through this means yet another facet of Commodus' Hercules becomes discernible. When Commodus showed himself to the public, dressed as Hercules, he often did so at the gladiatorial games, or even fighting as a gladiator.\(^4\) These actions have, even more than Commodus' identification with Hercules, led to severe criticism by both ancients and moderns. Dio mockingly recounts

---

Fig. 4. Colossal 'weary Hercules' type, with the head of Commodus, Palazzo Pitti, Florence. (Photo: DAI-Rom 1935.525).
how:

[Commodus] got together all the men in the city who had lost their feet as the result of a disease or some accident, and then, after fastening about their knees some likenesses of serpents, and giving them some sponges to throw instead of stones, killed them with blows from a club, pretending that they were giants.41

Dio also tells how, after so saving the world, the emperor planned to treat his subjects to a performance of the story of Hercules and the Stymphalian birds. He happily adds that many spectators shunned the arena out of fear of being shot in the course of the emperor's masquerade. But this gladiatorial display need not necessarily have been so ridiculous as some historians (especially Dio) have led us to believe—even if they, perhaps, perceived it as absurd, grotesque, or threatening.

In recent years, gladiatorial games have been re-examined, with more emphasis on their symbolic meaning than Michael Grant allowed for when describing them, almost forty years ago, as 'bloodthirsty holocausts in the arena' and 'orgies of cruelty'.42 New studies clearly connect the amphitheatre with the conflict between nature and culture. The arena is a liminal zone in which order and civilization constantly do battle with chaos and barbarism, in which virtus is shown, mythology re-enacted, and even death symbolically challenged—and conquered. 'Everyone had been reminded of their mortality: but whether a particular gladiator had won or lost, had fought bravely enough to be reprieved or had met the death that everyone had to face, the ritualization of the encounter with death had put death in its place.'43

Hercules obviously formed an apt divinity to evoke in this context. Not only had he eventually conquered death on Mount Oetaeus (and kidnapped Cerberus himself out of the underworld), he had, during his lifetime, perpetually fought against barbarism, symbolized by the monsters that he defeated. When Commodus, dressed as Hercules, fought as a gladiator, he showed his assembled people how he defended the world against chaos, as the hero with whom he identified had done before him. Like that hero, he too would rise to immortality, becoming the immortal Commodus-Hercules that the Capitoline bust showed. In doing so, he rose far above the people that he ruled: 'He named the Roman people the "people of Commodus", since he had very often fought as a gladiator in their presence'.44

This ceremonial display was also broadcast to those who were not physically present in the amphitheatre. From about AD 190 onwards, Commodus' (and Commodus-Hercules') portraits on both coins and statues show a very short haircut\(^4\) – known also to have been characteristic of a class of gladiators.\(^5\) The use of such a short crop is especially remarkable when one notices that Commodus' hair was previously 'always dyed and made lustrous by the use of gold dust', thus creating a colour of hair that according to Polemo's physiognomies showed remarkable and laudable character-trait.\(^6\) The change to a gladiatorial representation must have been noticeable.
Propagating power: Hercules as an example for second-century emperors

Another attempt to use ceremony as a way to show the power and the glory of the god-emperor Commodus-Hercules failed spectacularly. Commodus had planned to enter the new consular year of AD 193 dressed as Hercules, accompanied by gladiators. He even wanted to spend the night at the gladiatorial barracks, rather than on the Palatine. This would have shown the divine emperor-gladiator in command at an important transition. The ceremony would have portrayed Commodus' quasi-omnipotence, as imperial monuments transmitted the emperor's dazzling power – 'the emperor, as reflected in the monuments, took on the qualities of time associated with ritual landscape'.\(^7\) Instead, on New Year's Eve AD 192, he was killed.\(^8\)

The Senate rapidly condemned his memory, unsurprisingly for a body that had been consistently ignored for most of Commodus' reign. The sheer vehemence of the condemnation is wonderfully illustrated by a passage from the Historia Augusta, which claims to go back to Marius Maximus:

> From him who was a foe of his fatherland let his honours be taken away! Let the honours of the murderer be taken away, let the murderer be dragged in the dust! The foe of his fatherland, the murderer, the gladiator, in the charnel-house let him be mangled! He is foe to the gods, slayer of the senate, foe to the gods, murderer of the senate, foe of the gods, foe of the senate! Cast the gladiator into the charnel house!\(^9\)

This 'acclamation' goes on for well over twenty lines, 'a foe, a murderer, verily, verily' (18.5), 'let the statues of the murderer and the gladiator be overthrown' (19.1). If these were the sentiments of the majority of senators, it seems hardly surprising that our senatorial sources paint a negative picture of the last Antonine – nor does that picture appear terribly trustworthy.\(^10\) Literary texts consistently ignore the possibility that what Commodus was doing when presenting himself as a gladiatorial Hercules formed part of a coherent programme. That does not mean that the possibility should remain ignored.

Rhetoric, iconography, symbols, and ceremony: all of them showed Commodus as the god-emperor Commodus-Hercules. Of course one should be wary not to read too much into the evidence, and the presence of a coherent programme does not necessarily make Commodus a sane and sound ruler. But one should not trust the literary sources at face value either. Especially not when the material evidence suggests something altogether different. Commodus seems to have wanted to broadcast the message that he was the new Hercules, and that he ruled through his divine abilities.

This message seems to have developed only after AD 183, to grow stronger around AD 185. Coins suggest as much. It seems hardly rash to assume that the strengthening of the programme of religious legitimation can be associated with contemporary political context. Especially since AD 183 saw a failed plot to assassinate Commodus, instigated by his sister Lucilla, and AD 185 was characterized by a rebellion by Maternus and the fall of Commodus’ ‘second-in-command’, Perennis. It is likely that the loss of parts of his power base – first his family, then his staunchest supporter – led Commodus to a different form of legitimation. In AD 190, shortly before Commodus started his activities in the arena, the ‘regent’ Cleander fell during a popular uprising. Unpopularity with the ‘people’ would be dangerous for Commodus, who had already alienated most senators. Strong emphasis on divine provenance and power, and the peace that the emperor had brought, would be a way to keep the populus on the emperor’s side, particularly if that message was presented directly to the assembled people in the amphitheatre.

Possibly ‘legitimation’ is also too narrow a term to capture Commodus’ purposes. As Mary Beard argued: ‘However hard it may have been to convince the population of the empire, from Rome to London, that the emperor ruled the planet…it was always more difficult for the emperor himself to make that leap of faith…self-representation must, in other words, be always on top of the monarch’s agenda.’ Commodus surely tried to convince the empire of the justness of his position. But he may have tried to explain to himself what being an emperor meant as well. As ‘helper and protector’ of his government, there were worse examples to choose than Hercules.

Addendum
Since this paper was originally written, Hekster 2001a, 2001b and 2002 have been published, dealing with similar topics, and partly using similar arguments. References have been added where relevant. Further literature, which appeared after 1998, has not been incorporated systematically. A Dutch version of this article was published as ‘Hele keizers en een halve god. Hercules en de representatie van de macht’, Lampas 35.2, 2002, 152–67.
Propagating power: Hercules as an example for second-century emperors

Acknowledgements
Alternative versions of this paper were read in Cardiff and Bristol (at the Bristol Myth Colloquium, 14–16 July 1998). My gratitude goes to the audiences in both places for their reactions. Fergus Millar and Jas Elsner kindly commented on earlier drafts. Their comments have been of great help, as were substantial grants from the Arts and Humanities Research Board, and the Dutch Foundation for Pure Research (NWO). Translations of the literary sources are based upon the Loeb Classical Library. I am, of course, responsible for all remaining flaws and inconsistencies in the text.

Notes
1 Roma, Museo Nazionale delle Terme, inv. 124481; Strack 1931, 95–104; RIC 3, Trajan, nos. 37, 49–51, 112, 689–90, 699–702, 773, 802.
2 Pliny Panegyricus, 14.5: ...tantam admirationem tui non sine quodam timore conceperit, quamit ille genitus love post saevas labores duraque imperia regi suo indomitus semper indefessusque referebat.
3 Albertini Hercules, Parma, Museo Nazionale; Carnelian ringstone, Munich, Staatliche Münzsammlungen A2222; Palagia 1986, 145; Laubscher 1997, fig. 8.
5 Mart. Epigr. 5.65.
6 Silvae, 4.2, 50–1: sic gravis Alcides post horrida iussa reversus/ gaudebat strato latus acclinare leoni.
7 Statius Silvae, 4.3, 155–7: Ibis qua uagos Hercules et Eubani/ ultra sidera flammeunque solern | et Nili caput et nives Atlantis; Coleman 1988, 134.
8 Val. Arg. 4.2; Malamud and McGuire 1993, 210–11.
9 Sil. Pun. 13.632–3: Attribuitque paris sedes, ubi magna moratur Alcidae genetrix, ubi sacro munere Leda. Scipio was in any case strongly associated with Hercules. He built, for instance, a temple to the god on the Forum Boarium; Coarelli 1996, 11–12; Galinsky 1972, 128. On Hercules in Silius Italicus see Rawlings, this volume.
12 R. Ritterling, RE XII, 1376, 1384–5; Bennet 2001, 72 n. 82.
13 RIC 3, no. 695; no. 702.
14 Legio I Italica: Ritterling, RE XII, 1374; Legio II Adiutrix: Speidel 1984, 19. The animal could also (like the Erymanthian Boar) refer to Hercules.
15 RIC 3, Trajan, no. 581; Shotter 1979, 51.
17 For interpretations of Hercules as a philosophical example: Seneca Ben. 1.13.3; Herc. Oet. 1946; Griffin 1976, 238; OKell, this volume.
18 Trajan is often said to have started the use of the Hercules Gaditanus in Rome. This follows from an argument set out by Strack 1931, 95–105, who attributed as a cult statue to Hercules Gaditanus a depiction of a Herculean statue (the pedestal is visible) on the reverse of a series of Trajanic coins dated AD 101–4 (RIC 3, 247, nos. 37, 49–51). Literary sources, however, make clear that no such cult statue existed (Sil. Pun. 3.30.1: nulla effigies simulacrae; Philostr. VHist 5.5). It may, instead, be the case that the reverses depict a Herculean statue from the Ara Maxima on the Forum Boarium. Between 100–4 Trajan restored this area, which had been heavily damaged in the fire of 64. Furthermore, the Acts of the Arval Brothers, as mentioned above, named Hercules Victor, the Hercules worshipped at the Ara Maxima, in January 101 amongst the gods that were invoked for the safety of the emperor (CIL 6. 2074, 69). The attribution is of course conjectural, but certainly more plausible than a statue of Hercules Gaditanus, which is wholly based on Hadrian’s use of the deity.

19 RIC 3, Hadrian, nos. 57–8.
22 Derichs 1950, 64.
23 Aristides Or. Rom. 33.
26 In the Roman empire it was officially not allowed to appoint a political successor by testament; Veyne 19762, 594; 607; Mommsen 1878, 770. Also Hekster 2001b, 35–7, 45–9.
27 Herodian 1.5.5–6. Contra Traupman 1956, 38: ‘Marcus gave ample evidence of his unwavering decision to make Commodus his successor, and we may take this as proof that Marcus believed his son morally and intellectually capable of carrying on his own work’.
32 Manuel Nieto Soria 1998, 107–17; Chartier 1985, 497–501. Both authors define these vehicles in the context of the origins of the modern state, but give conditions that can equally well apply to the Roman empire.
34 RIC 3, Trajan, nos. 699–701.
37 Hannah 1986, 337–42.
38 Kleiner 1992, 277.
39 Athenaeus, Deipnosophistae, 12.537 ff.: τί οὖν θαυμαστὸν εἰ καὶ καθ’ ἡμᾶς
Propagating power: Hercules as an example for second-century emperors

Κόμμοδος ὁ αὐτοκράτωρ ἐπὶ τῶν ὀχήματος παρακείμενον ἔχει τὸ Ἦρακλειον ὄπολαν ὑπεστρωμένης αὐτῷ λεοντής καὶ Ἦρακλῆς καλέσθαι ἤθελεν. Αλέξανδρου τοῦ Ἀριστοτελίκου τοσούτοις αὐτὸν ἁφομοιούντος θεοῖς, ἀτάρ καὶ τῇ Ἀρτέμιδι; Also Hekster 2001a, 80–1; Hekster 2002, 126–8.

40 Dio 73.19.2; 73.20.1; Herodian 1.15, 8–9; HA, Comm. 11, 10–11; 15, 5–6; Aur. Vict. Caes., 17, 4–6.

41 Dio 73.20.3: ἐπειδὴ ποτὲ πάντας τοὺς τῶν ποδῶν ἐν τῇ πόλει ὑπὸ νόσου ἢ καὶ ἐτέρας τινός συμφοράς ἐστερημένους άθροίσας δρακόντων τέ τινα αὐτοῖς εἴδη περί τὰ γόνατα περιέπλεξε, καὶ σπόγγους ἀντί λίθων βάλλειν δούς ἀπέκτεινέ σφας ροπάλφ παίων ὡς γίγαντας. Cf. HA, Comm. 9, 6, which replaces the club with bow and arrows.

42 Grant 1967, 118.

44 HA, Comm. 15.5: Commodianum etiam populum Romanum dixit, quo saepissime praesente gladiator pugnavit. For the specific role of the gladiatorial games in the self-representation of Commodus, and a more thorough discussion of recent literature on the subject, see Hekster 2001a; Hekster 2002, 137–62.

45 Gallery and museum of the Palazzo Ducale of Mantua (Fig. 5); Vatican Museum: Museo Chiaramonti, XXVII 8, inv. K.W.690 (Fig. 6); Kaiser-Raiß 1980, 55–6; Szaivert 1986, nos. 853–9, 1144–5, 1162–70.

48 Laurence 1993, 83.

52 On the problematic nature of literary sources surrounding an imperial life, and for an attempt to re-examine the image of an emperor through a range of different methodological approaches, see Elsner and Masters 1994.

53 AD 183: Szaivert 1986, nos. 585, 600, 615–16; Grosso 1964, 146. AD 185: Rostovtzeff 1923, 91f. But see Hekster 2002, 103–10, for a more thorough analysis of the coins, dating the origin of the Herculean image to AD 190.

Bibliography
Alföldi, G.

217
A few references extracted from the text:

Ando, C.
2000 Imperial Ideology and Provincial Loyalty in the Roman Empire, Berkeley and Los Angeles.

Barton, T.
1994 Power and knowledge: Astrology, physiognomics and medicine under the Roman empire, Ann Arbor.

Bayet, J.

Beard, M.

Bennet, J.

Bergmann, M.
1994 Der Koloß Neros, die Domus Aurea und der Mentalitätswandel im Rom der frühen Kaiserzeit, Mainz.

Birley, A.

Bonn, H. (ed.)
1996 Damnatio Memoriae: Das Berliner Nero-Porträt, Mainz am Rhein.

Chantraine, H.

Chartier, R.

Clavel-Lévêque, M.

Coarelli, F.

Coleman, K.
1990 ‘Fatal charades: Roman executions staged as mythological enactments’, JRS 80, 44–73.

Darwall-Smith, R.H.

De Ranieri, C.

Derichs, W.
1950 Herakles, Vorbild des Herrschers in der Antike, Ph.D diss., Köln

Elsner, J. and Masters, J.
Propagating power: Hercules as an example for second-century emperors

Fittschen, K.

Fittschen, K. and Zanker, P.

Galinsky, C.G.

Gleason, M.

Grant, M.
1967  Gladiators, Suffolk.

Griffin, M.

Gross, W.H.

Grosso, F.
1964  La lotta politica al tempo di Commodo, Turin.

Gunderson, E.

Hannah, R.

Hannestad, N.
1986  Roman art and imperial policy, Aarhus.

Hekster, O.

2001b  ‘All in the family. The appointment of emperors designate in the second century AD’, in L. de Blois (ed.) Administration, Prosopography and Appointment Policies in the Roman Empire [= Impact of Empire] 1, Amsterdam, 35–49.

Höistad, R.
1948  Cynic Hero and Cynic King: Studies in the Cynic conception of man, Uppsala.

Hopkins, K.

Kaiser-Raiß, M.
1980  Die Stadtrömische Münzprägung während der Alleinherrschaft des Commodus, Frankfurt am Main.

Kleiner, D.

Kolb, F.
Olivier Hekster

Laubscher, H.P.

Laurence, R.

Leander-Touati, A.

Levi, M.A.
1993 Adriano Augusto. Studi e ricerche, Rome.

Malamud, M. and McGuire, D.

Leander-Touati, A.

Malamud, M. and McGuire, D.

Leander-Touati, A.

Malamud, M. and McGuire, D.

Malamud, M. and McGuire, D.

Manuel Nieto Soria, J.

Matuz, J.

Mommsen, Th.

Morgan, L.

Palagia, O.

Rostovtzeff, M.

Scheid, J.

Scheider, R.
1982 Bildpropaganda der römischen Kaiserzeit unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Trajans-säule in Rom und korrespondierender Münzen, Bonn, 23.

Scheithauer, A.
1987 Kaiserbild und literarisches Programm. Untersuchungen zur Tendenz der Historia Augusta, Frankfurt am Main.

Shotter, D.

Smith, R.R.R.

Speidel, M.P.
1984 Roman Army Studies I, Amsterdam.
Strack, P.

Szaivert, W.

Thompson, J.B.

Thornton, M.K.
1975 ‘Hadrian and his reign’, ANRW II.2, 432–76.

Traupman, J.C.

Vermeule, C.C.

Veyne, P.

Wiedemann, T.